HAZELTON MAN MAKES GOOD AFTER THE WAR

Laboratory of Douglas Willemar Visited and Described by Comrade in Arms.

A Hazelton correspondent of the Victoria Colonist writes to that paper as follows:—

"This being one of the numerous centres of mining in British Columbia,—I was much interested in tracing the methods employed. From enquiries I heard that there was an assay laboratory at New Hazelton, so, wending my way thither, I found a small, but well equipped, laboratory about 100 yards distant from the railway.

"New Hazelton is a village of only a handful of inhabitants, but, being directly on the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, it is easily accessible from all parts of the district. On entering through the main door of the laboratory, I was agreeably surprised to find myself in a brilliantly sunny room, lighted by two good-sized windows, and was greeted as a fellow soldier by the cheery assayer, Douglas Ross Willemar. It soon transpired that we had gone over the top at Vimy Ridge at the same time, and that we must also both have been at Lens when that place was a veritable shambles, and where Mr. Willemar was so severely wounded that his friends gave him up for dead. Naturally, we fought our battles over again, and when we had arrived at that camaraderie, which can only be known to those who have faced danger and death together, we proceeded with the business for which I had come.

The Laboratory.

I asked Mr. Willemar to explain to me the uses of all the mysterious phials and apparatus surrounding us, but he laughingly protested that that would take too long and would not interest outsiders. However, I gathered much interesting information. For instance, Mr. Willemar had fitted up the laboratory entirely himself. The old building in which it had been when he took it over was small, dark, and possessed no conveniences at all. Mr. Willemar had placed a long narrow table, with rounded ends, down the centre of the room; on this he had made and placed a wooden rack to hold filters, and also sets of wooden burette stands, all fixed securely to the table, so that an accidental shake or blow would not break the costly burettes, filters, breakers, etc., nor derange the work. He had also fixed a strong shelf to the wall at the back, where, in a good light and without danger of their being shaken, the delicate balances could be manipulated with ease by anyone, either standing or seated. Previously the water arrangements also had been very primitive, but our soldier-assayer had rigged up a water tank, which was raised to the ceiling and lowered by means of a cable and pulley, thus ensuring a free run of water all the time through the attached rubber piping, and at the same time giving more floor space.

"Mr. Willemar showed me his shelves, stocked with various chemicals, all methodically labelled, each in a place of its very own. He then took me into an adjoining room, separated from the first large room by a swing door, and there showed me how he had placed the furnace on a concrete table, with a large ventilating shaft through the roof, so that no fumes were given off in the room, and the noise, heat, etc., did not interfere with the delicate machines in the other room in any way.

His Own Work.

"There was a 'stink' cupboard in one corner, also well ventilated, a chest of drawers containing fluxes conveniently at hand on a small shelf, and then, with natural pride, Mr. Willemar showed me a sink and draining board that he had built himself, which, as he pointed out, saved much trouble and inconvenience, and many steps. Mr. Willemar modestly disclaimed any praise for all this modern and business-like equipment and his up-to-date methods, but I happened to know that when he first arrived to take over the old assay office it consisted of only one small shack, in which were huddled together the furnace, stink cupboard, balances, burettes, books, desk, etc., so that when the furnace was in use it was impossible to do any other work on account of the heat, noise and vibration, and the fact that the fumes filled the small room and contaminated everything in it. Now it is clean, convenient and businesslike, and Mr. Willemar and his assistant, a charming young lady, can both 'carry on' independently, and consequently accomplish double the amount of work with more ease and less fatigue in a shorter time.

Loan Helped.

That this has been brought to pass is largely due to the instrumentality of the Vocational Loan Department of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and particularly through the businesslike methods of a 'live' member of the staff who came, saw and was conquered by the ability and business acumen displayed by his comrade-in-arms. Thanks to the Vocational Loan Department's promptness in arranging the business side of a loan, Mr. Willemar is now set on his feet, after having given up a lucrative ranch and fur business to fight the Hun—all of which he lost through his absence in France. He wished to express his appreciation for the excellent course in mineralogy and assaying granted to returned soldiers at the University of British Columbia, and the kindness, courtesy and great personal interest displayed by the professors and their able assistants, and to the businesslike methods of the Vocational Loan Department, their promptness and courtesy.

Fifteen Wounds.

"For myself, I was surprised and touched at the pluck of this man, who spoke so little of himself and so much in praise of others, and I thought that old Britain need never despair, when her sons would give up all, as had this one, face untold hardships, endure dreadful wounds and the wearisome time in a military hospital (Mr. Willemar had fifteen severe wounds besides being gassed and shell-shocked), lose all for which he had worked so hard before, and yet start in again at the very beginning, smiling and cheerful, heavily handicapped, to begin life all over again and compete with men who had never endured the rigors and hardships of a campaign such as this one.

SAVE YOUR SIGHT

EYESIGHT—The most valuable of all the senses—is the most neglected and the least understood. Many suffer from ills, which, upon examination, can be traced directly to defective eyesight.

THE removal of the cause will often restore the delicate and run-down sufferer to robust health. When glasses are properly prescribed, they restore the vision to normal and eliminate all eye strain.
