

A LIFETIME OF SICKNESS

Worn Out, Thin and Miserable Until She Took "Fruit-a-lives"

PALMESTON, June 20th, 1914.
"Stomach Trouble and Distressing Headaches nearly drove me wild. Some time ago, I got a box of "Fruit-a-lives," your famous fruit medicine, and they completely relieved me. To-day I am feeling fine and a physician, meeting me on the street, asked the reason for my improved appearance. I said, "I am taking Fruit-a-lives." He said, "If Fruit-a-lives make you look so well, go ahead and take them. They are doing more for you than I can."

COUNT ZEPPELIN MADE FIRST FLIGHT IN U. S.

Count Ferdinand von Zeppelin, the airship inventor, has admitted that he was the "Count Steiner" who experimented with balloon flight in St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1863. His first aerial trip, he now admits, was made on August 9, 1863, at St. Paul, and it was while he was sailing aloft on that initial trip that the possibilities of aerial navigation and aerial warfare fixed themselves in his mind. He returned to Germany and spent his life and fortune trying to accomplish the task of overcoming the forces of gravitation, winds and weather.

Zeppelin met with many difficulties before he was able to ascend into the clouds, but on August 9th, with no less a distinguished guest than the daughter of the governor, he made his successful flight. Alexander Ramsey, the war governor of Minnesota, was to have journeyed up with him, but was too busy that day. So that little Marion Ramsey was his substitute. Miss Ramsey is now Mrs. C. E. Furness, of St. Paul, and she recalls the balloon ascension.

"I can remember making the flight," she says, "but did not realize until now that the pilot was Count von Zeppelin. I enjoyed my trip and was glad that mother was not there to stop me from going up."
St. Paul at the time was a frontier town, and gas was a scarce article. The balloon he used was owned by an army officer, who was experimenting with it as a captive balloon. Zeppelin's determination finally secured enough gas to give the buoyancy for a flight. The thrill of adventure was in his veins, for the count was then only twenty-five years old. While sailing over the forests and lakes, he conceived the idea of the dirigible, the application of power to directing the movements of gas airships. Instead of drifting with the breezes he believed it possible to follow a course, if the proper power machine could be procured. Later on, when the gas engine was perfected, the count was able to secure the needed power, and in his half-century of experimenting since his flight at St. Paul he has demonstrated his theories to be entirely practical.

The count, though seventy-seven years old now, is hoping to see the day when one of his Zeppelins will cross the Atlantic, and nothing would please him more than to be at the helm and pilot the craft to St. Paul, where he obtained his inspiration.—Tit Bits.
