MR. CLEMENTS GIVES PLANS FOR COMOX-ATLIN

COPIES OF THE DAILY NEWS PROVE CLUE TO HIS IDENTITY

DEAD BODY OF MAN KILLED ON WASHINGTON RAILROAD IS SUPPOSED TO BE P. J. CARRIGAN, THE PROSPECTOR, HAD MUSHED HERE FROM EDMONTON LAST AUGUST.

P. J. Carrigan, the lone prospector who a few weeks ago mushed it all alone from Edmonton to Prince Rupert, is dead, having met a tragic death on the railroad track near Kelso, Washington. Of that there is little doubt after reading a letter which arrived at The News office from Dr. Floyd A. Bird, coroner of Comox county, Washington.

The dead man, who was struck by a train, was identified through having in his pocket a copy of the Prince Rupert Daily News and a clipping, both relating to the exploits of Carrigan as published in The News of Monday, September 25th. He is described by the coroner as a man of about 150 pounds, 5 feet 7 inches tall, with dark hair and clean shaven face. At the time of his death he was wearing a greenish blue suit and a gray mackinaw coat. The description leaves little doubt that the unfortunate victim of the railroad is Mr. Carrigan.

MADE ELOQUENT AND SYMPATHETIC APPEAL ON THE INDIANS' BEHALF

Rev. W. E. Collison in a Masterly Address Told of the History, Religion, Character and Deeds of the Indians—Has Been Brought Up Among Them and Has Faith in Their Future

Intensely interesting was the address delivered in the Presbyterian Church hall last night by Rev. W. E. Collison on "The Indians of the North Pacific Coast." Far too small an audience heard it. Born, himself, on the coast with Indian boys only as his playmates for his early years, Mr. Collison has the Indian tongues at marvelous command, and his illustrations of the power of expression in the many languages of the coast Indians well conveyed the fact that the coast races have sprung from no mean crowd of savages, but seem rather to have degenerated from a highly developed race.

That chief on his deathbed. The Indians' Appeal. To repeat last night's lecture would take a whole paper. It was to the last degree full, varied and interesting. In his conclusion the Rev. Mr. Collison struck a fine note of appeal for the Indian race, anxious now after all their long history to become like the white men, whom they so aptly mimic. He spoke of the reserves, denying that they contain so much better land than that about them and pointing out that there is little chance of the Indians ever improving land to which they have neither individually nor in community any real title. "Would any civilized white man or group of white men do it?" asked the speaker. The Indians' appeal, concluded Mr. Collison, is for terms of equity now with the incoming white men whom he sees taking possession of his old hunting grounds and gardens. "Treat me like a man," he cries, "and you will have a good man, and a good citizen."

Old Indian Legends. Touching on the far-reaching "crest system" of the Indians, on their laws of succession, of marriage and of revenge in the early days, Rev. Collison held his audience in rapt attention for over two hours. He told the story of the totem pole with one or two of the familiar legends which the Indians hand down, one in particular being strikingly reminiscent of the Bible account of Jonah and the whale. Mr. Collison mentioned also that all the Indian tribes have in their legendary history accounts of the flood, only each tribe claims the survivors as its own members.

Slow Three Grizzlies.

Hunting stories Mr. Collison told, the great one being that of the chief who slew three grizzlies single-handed, the last one by clutching it with his wiry arms and legs so that it could not reach him vitally with tooth or claw, nor shake him off, he all the while gnawing his way into its windpipe. The hunter was found side by side with his trophies, the last bear dead, the chief all but gone from loss of blood, as the bear had scratched his back almost to ribbons. Rev. W. E. Collison saw the man, heard the story from his own lips and vouched for its truth as he had seen the scars on his back. Archdeacon Collison has the skull of the great grizzly given him by

DAINTY WORK DONE IN GAOL

Prisoner Valentine Stella Has Modelled in Chewed Bread a Whole Street Grading Outfit With Drills and Wheelbarrow.

Work of marvelous neatness considering the uncouth material used has been executed in chewed bread and a few chips of wood by Prisoner Valentine Stella, held on an assault charge in the city gaol. Repeated adjournments have caused this case to drag on for many days, and during the delay Stella has secretly contrived to pass the time by modeling with his dinner bread a full miner's equipment or street grading outfit for a wheelbarrow gang. All kinds of drills, crowbars and hammers, a pick, a mattack, a double bitted axe, a pointed shovel and a wonderfully neat wheelbarrow have been made by the prisoner. The work was not quite finished when discovered and confiscated by the police. Stella has repeatedly asked to be set to work, but this cannot be allowed under the circumstances of his case, which is still pending.
