TRUSTS AND CORONETS

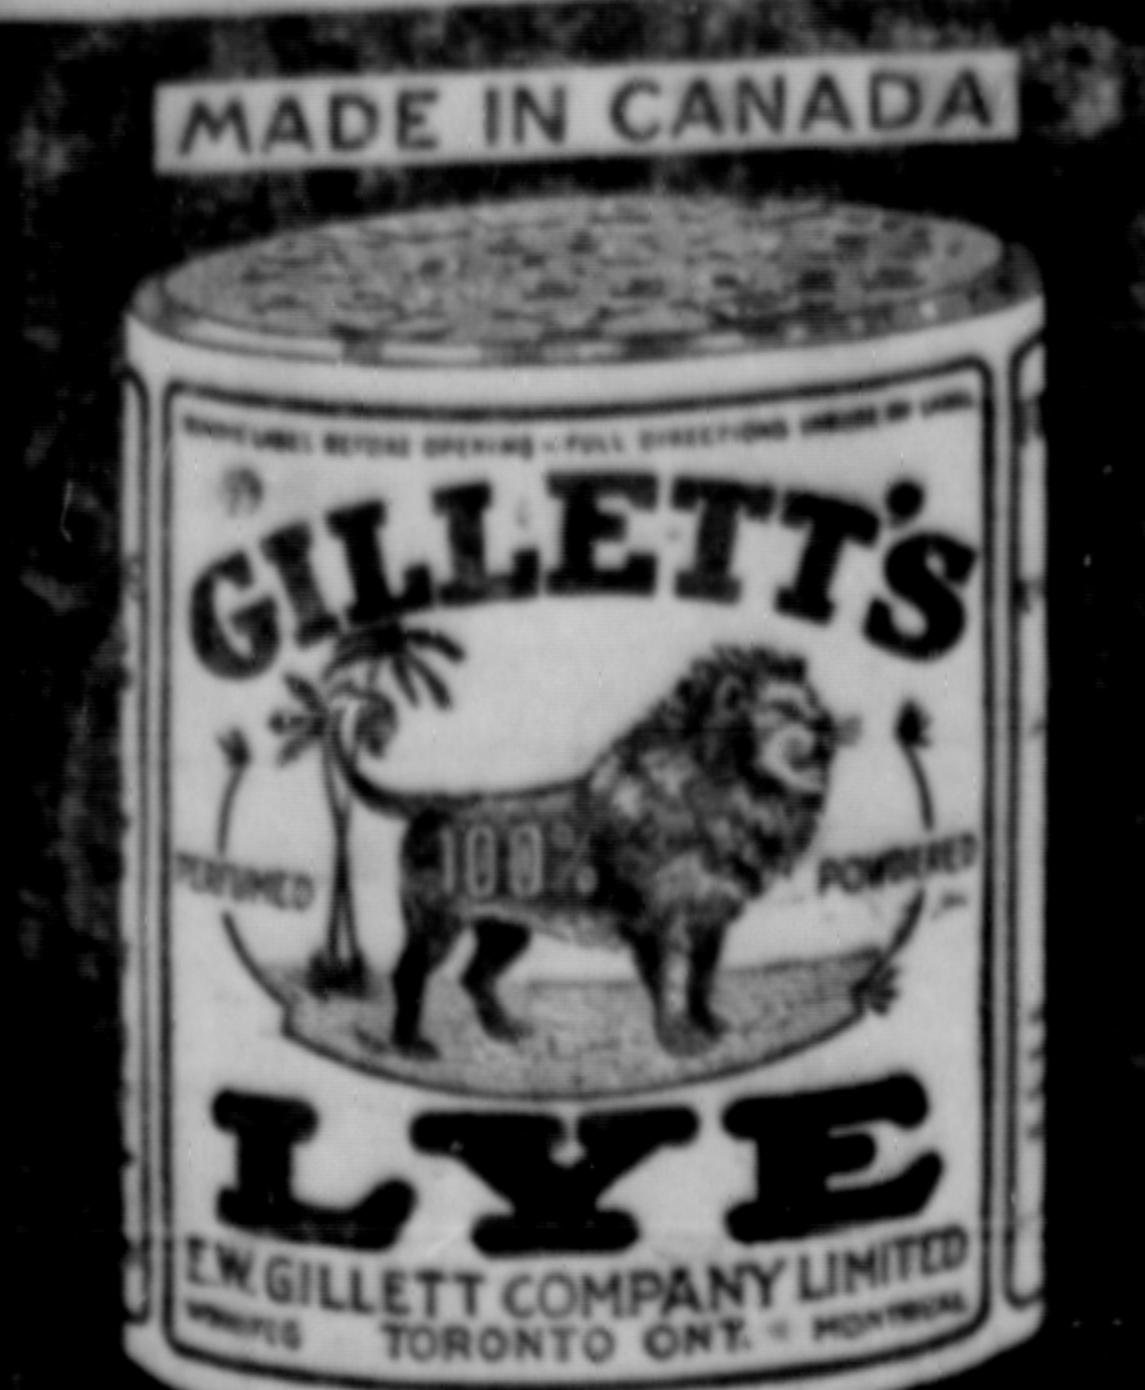

"The prostitution of honors," These are the stinging words with which The London Times opens its attack on the British Government for its failure to break with the evil traditions of pre-war days in the creation of titles that reek of the traffic of the market place. The refusal of the Government to promise reform in the method of recommending to the Sovereign the names of men eligible for honors and awards draws from The Times the following trenchant remarks:

"No real answer to the demand for reform was forthcoming in February, 1914, and no promise was given to undertake reform. The reasons are plain. Party men who have risen and thriven under the old system do not wish to disturb the machinery which has served them and which they know how to manipulate. Nobody loves corruption for its own sake, but case-hardened politicians agree with Lord Ribblesdale's view, expressed in the former debate, that the evil has always existed in one form or another, that it is 'not so very terrible,' that there is no use 'tilting at windmills,' and that 'the thing is better, left very much as it is.' That is not the view of the public. They are alive to the scandal."

The question of titles in the United Kingdom is a matter that concerns the British people. The traffic in honors is their business and their shame. No Canadian will seek to interfere in the domestic affairs of the sister nation. That the question has been raised there in definite form gives hope that Democracy is alive to the evils of the class system, and is determined to purge public life of the uncleanness which has been unveiled by the recent debate in the British House. The people of the Dominions, however, are keenly interested in the permanent effects of this great war on the life of the British Isles. It is the earnest desire of those who in distant lands look to the old country and its institutions as the cradle of their liberties and the background of their civilization that the coming of peace and the destruction of autocracy in Europe will find the British nation ready and willing to take up its appointed task of "making the world safe for Democracy." The world never can be safe for Democracy while honors are sold in the marketplace and the barriers of an upper class remain to shut out the masses of the people from their full heritage of equal citizenship. British statesmen fail to read aright the signs of the times when they daily over one of the fundamentals of the new-world Democracy—that hereditary class distinctions are an abomination to nations that have gone through the fiery furnace of a conflagration that had its origin in the mediaeval doctrine of the divine right of Kings, and of the power of an aristocratic class to forge the weapons of a bloody and inhuman war. As the power and the glory are departing from the class rulers of Britain, why tolerate any longer the unmeaning symbols of class distinctions and privileges that are alien to the spirit of the age?

But we in Canada have a more direct interest in the granting of titles when the British Government, of its own volition, recommends the Sovereign to scatter on the democratic soil of this American continent the noxious seeds of an effete and discredited class system. Canada is not honored by the elevation of her citizens to ranks and titles that cut them off from the main currents of thought and life in their own country, and that turn their eyes eastward to the temples and altars of strange gods that know not Democracy. It leaves scars on the soul of the nation when the King showers his Royal favors on Demetrius, the silversmith, and receives on the steps of the Throne, as men worthy of all honor and as exemplars to their generation, Trust and Monopoly barons on whom American democracy has served notice to quit. The days that lie ahead belong to Democracy. For that great hope Canada is fighting overseas. No barriers of race or class or creed must be set up
