A GERMAN PEACE.

The terms upon which Germany expects to remain at peace with Russia makes interesting reading. It is the most interesting in this respect, that it shows something of the terms which the Germans would like to impose upon the Western Allies, if she had the chance. Russia has to give up everything that her erstwhile German friends ask, which is not little either. In addition to this, she has to help Turkey in every way in her power to secure the orderly return of her old frontiers, thereby putting Armenia once more in the power of the Turk to wreak further horrors upon this ancient people. And Russia has to pay. Were Russia a thoroughly conquered nation, bound and helpless, overrun and absolutely in the grasp of a conqueror, the terms thus imposed could hardly be more severe. The helpless condition in which the largest nation in Europe now finds itself is apparently so patent to the Germans that the actual conquering and over-running of that country is not necessary.

Germany proposes to annex Russian territory nearly as large as Great Britain, and also to make the Russian Government pay "civil damages" as well as an indemnity for the support of war prisoners. The Russian armies are to be demobilized at once, the Russian warships to be disarmed and kept in port, and one of the greatest pleasures of the whole schedule of terms is that any warships of the entente now in Russian waters, are to be regarded as Russian ships. Then Russia is to agree to the free export of ore into Germany and to tie herself to Germany with a trade treaty, making that country the most favored.

It is one thing, however, for the German government to make such a treaty with the Russians, when the Russians cannot help themselves. It is quite another thing, however, for that treaty to remain in force after the final peace terms are signed. That Germany will be permitted to make free with and to extend her borders over Russian territory is unlikely. In matters of this kind, the other nations have something to say. There have been many speculations as to what kind of peace terms the Germans would impose upon the entente, were they victorious. These, however, are more or less in vain. A victorious Germany is the last thing to think about while there is a fighting man left. On the other hand, there are also many speculations as to the peace terms which will be imposed upon Germany and the Central powers by the allies when they are successful, as they must be, finally. The general principles have already been outlined, but has to how these will be applied remains to be seen.

THE OFFENSIVE.

The increasing pressure which the French troops are applying to the German line is being taken to mean the commencement of the offensive by the allies. The tactics employed denote a different kind of strategy from that adopted last year, being a series of terrific raids upon the German trenches, after an intense preliminary bombardment. This time, instead of pressing forward and making any attempt to capture the German positions, the French troops are apparently content to return to their own lines, after doing all the damage they can, and taking all the prisoners they can get, and incidentally, killing as many Germans as possible at the same time. The intention, apparently is to menace the whole line simultaneously, in an effort to tempt the Germans to come on with their offensive or else retire from their broken positions.

Under such conditions, life in the German front line trenches must be distinctly unenviable. Between bombardments and fierce raids at unexpected moments, the German soldiers must find it a hard matter of keeping their courage up and maintaining any de-
