THE GERMAN REACTION.

The War prophet has long since ceased to have honor in his own or any other country. War, we have learned by this time, sets free vast elementary forces whose action is less susceptible of calculation than the behavior of a reawakened volcano, and the most cautious and best informed of writers would hardly care to be confronted with the cold print of the predictions he had made since 1914. An example of the salutary power of experience has been the instinctive caution with which the press of the Allied countries has avoided the tempting new field for vaticination opened up by the German strikes. The latest reports have justified their caution; they may also tempt one to abandon it by drawing conclusions just the opposite to those in which one was inclined to indulge a few days ago. But we do not incur the responsibilities of the prophet by remarking that the hopes for the political regeneration of Germany which were based on the events of the last week must be abandoned in the meantime. The General Strike, on whose paralyzing effect the Marxites laid such stress, is impotent to overturn a settled government unless, as was the case in Russia, it is backed up by the army and accompanied by the seizure of all public property; and the uncertainty of its success in any circumstances is curiously illustrated by the recent assertion of the Bolshevik leaders that in order to save the Revolution it was necessary to deprive it of the power of self defence by abolishing military discipline and cashiering the officers.

In the minds of the German people—to whom nothing is so terrifying as social disorder and an urgent call on the individual will—the present plight of Russia must be a very powerful antidote to the "Russian infection" of democracy which the German government appear to dread. Famine and general misery were the causes of the German strikes; acute famine and a deeper misery a misery unrelieved by political idealism and political courage—have apparently been the causes of their failure. And now Prussian Militarism presents us with a heroic picture of itself in the act of brushing aside the last stray bees of the insurgent hives, and turning from such petty things as futile strikes to the real Order of the Day—the bolstering up of the U-boat campaign, and the extraction of tonics for tired Teutons from the utterances of Allied statesmen. As was inevitable, fighting capital is made out of Lord Lansdowne's unfortunate soliloquy, and Sir Eric Geddes's statements as to the U-boats are replied to with the vague blusterings which in the land of Kant and Goethe seems nowadays to pass for both fact and argument. The rebellious serfs of Saxony and the Rhineland, herded back to their tasks, may console themselves for their humiliation by reading accounts of the new decoration for submarine crews and by their own interpretation of the "Frankfurter Zeitung's" assertion that "the war must first be terminated before a coalition of nations takes place."

What has been has been, however. The strikes, though their extent may have been exaggerated, are a fact in German War history which the government may have yet to reckon with; and the dissolved Labor Council is an abandoned outwork which may be reoccupied. Events so far, it is true offer little encouragement to those who, accepting the postulate of a fixed national psychology, have turned for light to the history of the rising of 1848. "This is not riot, but revolution," Metternich was told by the insurgents who burst into the Palace at Vienna in March of that year. And "Revolution" was the term applied throughout Europe to the series of dramatic events that, beginning with the flight of Metternich, culminated in the donning of Revolutionary emblems by the despots of Austria and Prussia, and in their recognition of the self-elected Preliminary Parliament of Frankfort, but in January, 1849, Frederick William IV. responded in high-Hollenzollerne to the Parliament's offer of the headship of Germany, and tossed back disdainfully a crown which "dishonored him unspeakably with its carion colour of revolution." A few months later the "rump" of the Frankfort Parliament were evicted by a company of Wurttemberg soldiers; the era of Bismarck had begun. Are the fetters then fastened to be double-locked today, and to be laid on more of Europe? If the answer depended merely on the traditional "psychology" of Germany, the outlook would be dismal indeed. But the psychologies of the Allied Nations are also concerned, and the vigorous expression of them in the War will not only free Europe for ever from the Prussian menace, but in doing so will alter the psychology of the German people to the extent of impelling them to seize the birthright of free and honest government which they renounced seventy years ago for the sour potage of Prussianism.—G.H.
