There was a narrow escape from a drowning accident yesterday afternoon about five o'clock when little Ernie Allistone slipped off the float at the government wharf into the water. He had been down selling papers, and on the land side of the float, where the planks were slippery, he slid right in. Luckily, there was a big spike sticking out from the timbers, which he was able to grasp and keep his head up above water. Mr. Howard Steen happened to be making a delivery there at the time, and heard a faint cry. On going round the float he saw the boy's head. He pulled him out and drove him home at once, where this morning he was none the worse. It was fortunate that Mr. Steen was there at the time, for the other occupants of the float from their position could never have heard the boy's cries.
