REV. WILLIAM DUNCAN DIES

Famous Missionary to Indians
Passed Away a Few Days
Ago at New Metlakatla.

Word comes from Ketchikan by way of Vancouver that Rev. William Duncan of New Metlakatla and the founder of the Indian mission near Prince Rupert died at his home of apoplexy.

"Father" Duncan, as he was known throughout Southern Alaska, was 86 years of age, and had worked for 61 years as a missionary. He was born in Beverly, England. He was sent to British Columbia by the Church Missionary Society of London, and won remarkable success among the Indians at the original Metlakatla which is situated a few miles from Prince Rupert. There has been efforts in the building up of an industrial settlement of considerable extent, which the Indians conducted under his direction. His control over the Indians was a subject of wide comment. At his instance they built a church whose beauty has attracted the attention of thousands of travellers along the coast. Besides the church, there were an industrial school, a boys' home, a girls' home and other educational facilities.

The industrial features of Metlakatla, all the result of Mr. Duncan's labors, included a sawmill, a woollen mill, a cannery and a brickyard. Under the direction of their beloved missionary the Indians also developed much musical ability, having a brass band and showing their taste for music by possessing many organs.

In course of time the society sent out Bishop Ridley to take charge and look after its interests. "Father" Duncan objected to the Bishop's supervision, and after some disputing over the matter of jurisdiction he left the settlement which he had built up and crossed to Annette Island, Alaska, where he founded New Metlakatla, a large number of his old flock going with him. The controversy between the partisans of the two men raged bitterly for a time and attracted wide attention.

"Vancouver weather here all right," remarked a visitor jokingly up town yesterday when the sun was shining brilliantly. "Vancouver weather" was turned back upon him when he got to the wharf to see the steamer arrive, and found the water surface covered with white fog.
