BRINGING UP FATHER

Wonderful Study of Germs Described by Dr. W. T. Kergin to the Rotary Club Yesterday

Disease germs are so small as to be outside the ordinary vision of mortals and so prolific that they increase at a tremendous rate, though they live only a few seconds. A drop of water could contain half a million blood cells, and each of these cells may have several hundred bacteria or germs. That was some of the intensely interesting information given by Dr. W. T. Kergin to the Rotary Club yesterday in an address on "The Germ Theory."

The doctor said that germs were the chief cause of disease, and their discovery was the greatest single step in the history of medicine, placing it on a scientific basis.

Hippocrates was the father of modern medicine as being the first to attempt its scientific study. Nothing was done in the way of development during the dark ages but the clergy did useful work in dispensing simple remedies. The early development of surgery had much to do with the result of warfare. Anatomists and surgeons worked out what is at present known of anatomy. They are still investigating the functions of some of the organs.

Pasteur's Discovery.
The greatest single step in the development of surgery was the discovery of germs as a causative factor in disease. To Pasteur is given the credit of most of the earlier discoveries. It is now proven beyond a doubt that germs are the most potent factor in disease and the greatest enemy man has.

"All life is relative," declared the speaker. "Man is small compared with the elephant but huge compared to the ant. Germs occupy a world beyond the vision of the naked eye. There is a whole world of life beyond our vision."

The doctor explained that not all germs were disease germs. The greater number are useful. The disease germ has no particular enmity to man but makes its attack in the ordinary way of getting its living. The products of the vital functions of disease germs are poisonous to mankind. The problem is to study them and the conditions surrounding their life history with the idea of combating them.

Lord Lister's Work.
The speaker went on to explain that germs and vaccines were a most important discovery and development and their use was a scientific method of combating disease germs. In surgery it was shown that during the Crimean war thousands died from simple wounds as the result of wound infection. Lord Lister, who lived at that time, made a study of the difficult problem and was the first to use antiseptics in surgery. He worked out the theory that the deaths were due to germs and that they were preventable. Antiseptics had since been improved but Lister laid the foundation for their use.

Study had taught how to lessen or increase the virulence of germs. Growing under favorable conditions with a favorable food supply they became very virulent. On the other hand under poor conditions their virulence was much lessened. This knowledge is made use of in the preparation of serums and the combating of disease.

Man, in common with animals possesses a wonderful power of reacting to poison, the doctor showed that the subject could withstand steadily increasing doses of a drug as the body increased its defense. The body elaborated an antidote which neutralized or counteracted the poison. By utilizing the antidote or antitoxin thus elaborated and injecting it into the blood of another animal, the power of resistance was at once strengthened and the poison made of little effect.

Few Cases Fatal Now.

The methods of developing the antidote was explained, particularly in connection with diphtheria, the serum for which had a wonderful effect, so wonderful that whereas formerly one-third of all diphtheria cases proved fatal, today under treatment with serums not three percent were fatal and none should be if treatment were begun early enough. In diphtheria the germs in the throat produced poison which was distributed through the body. By injecting proper serum which constitutes an antidote, this poison was neutralized and the patient did not suffer as he otherwise would.

Dr. Kergin also spoke of the use of vaccine and explained that not all diseases could so far be benefited by serum or vaccine, but that researches being carried on were constantly adding new discoveries.
