ISLANDER WAS BLOWN PIECES

Former C.P.R. Steamer Located By Diver But No Treasure Secured.

The steamer Islander, wrecked at JEUEAU, Alaska, July 20.—20 years ago next month, lies in 300 feet of water, almost in the centre of Stephens Passage, one mile southwest of Marmion Island light, according to Capt. Frank Walters, deep sea diver, who located the wreck 10 days ago and who has been surveying it since that time.

Captain Walters, who is the man who salvaged the safe of the Princess Sophia in Lynn Canal last summer, organized an expedition this spring and almost two months ago arrived here on the seine boat Suenes to attempt to recover treasure known to be on board the Islander when she was wrecked. Accompanying him was another well known diver, Jack Clouse, and a specially constructed diving suit was used to allow for diving at a great depth.

Torn by Explosion.

Captain Walters said: "We located the wreck of the Islander 10 days ago and found that some terrible internal explosion occurred at the time the boat went down had broken her all up. The decking was all gone, the masts fallen and the whole thing a mass of twisted iron, from which the woodwork had been blown and rotted away."

"After our arrival here we wasted considerable time in searching for the lost steamer as there were so many conflicting reports as to where the boat struck and foundered," he continues. "Ten days ago we found it. The exact location is one mile from Marmion Island light, which is the little island at the south end of Douglas Island. By the compass," he said, "the wreck is one point west of south from the Island, almost in the centre of Stephens Passage."

france of Oliver Inlet on Admiralty Island to the Marmion Island light on the chart would almost pass over the wreck," he continued. "Sand and silt have filled the wreckage and banked up around it to a depth of about 15 feet as it lies upon its side."

Yesterday morning, Captain Walters took his last look at the wrecked vessel and was under water when the picnic party on the Amy passed. He found, he said, that there was absolutely no use in trying to recover anything that might have been on the boat when it went down, as it is his opinion that the great explosion that occurred at the time of the wreck not only blew the vessel to pieces, but scattered the contents all over the bottom of the Passage where they now lie covered with sand and silt.

Expedition Abandoned.

The expedition was abandoned after making sure of the condition of the boat and the Suenes left at noon today for Seattle.

Mr. Walters, before leaving, said that as far as being one of the mysteries of the seas, filled with treasure awaiting for some daring deep sea diver to take, the Islander is a closed incident and will no longer be spoken of as one of the rich prizes to be won by salvaging.

While in these waters, Captain Walters paid a visit to the wreck of the Princess Sophia in Lynn Canal and said that the planking and timbers of the vessel are becoming loosened and that there is little probability of her ever being brought up from her resting place.

Many people read newspapers as much for their advertising columns as they do for news.
