CAPTAIN JOHN IRVING, PIRATE

H. Gibbons Tells Story of Well Known Coast Mariner's Practical Joke.

C. H. Gibbons of Victoria tells the following story about Capt. John Irving:

Thousands of columns in American newspapers during the recent months have focused attention on the mysterious movements of possible pirate craft on the Atlantic seaboard, with resultant follow-up stories galore recounting the doings of the pirates of the present days of profiteer and bootlegger. All seem to have missed, however, the master exploit, who, investing $32, equivalent of the orthodox pieces-of-eight, as capital in the black business, caused Uncl Sam to spend half a million and probably more to defeat his nefarious schemes. It wasn't so long ago, either—just twenty-two years, to be truthful. And he was, and still is, Captain John Irving, himself for long years a seafaring man of renown and head of the Canadian Pacific Navigation Co., until his absorption by the C. P. R.

Captain John is a whimsical cuss, original, too, in streaks. It was while standing one night with a foot on the brass rail in the Grotto Bar, Victoria, that he gleefully committed himself to a carnival of crime, careless even as to the safety of his extra-master mariner's ticket, which will show just how reckless he felt. Another brother-skipper had been broadly boasting of how they had cleverly captured the transportation trade of the Klondike argonauts, and the Commodore's goal was theirs. In the desperation of the bereavement he vowed his dire revenge.

The C. P. R. telegraph office was directly across the way. The Spanish-American War was then at its comic opera climax. He forthwith strode the red requisite paces and despatched a cablegram (which "nicked him these thirty-two cases) to "War Minister Madrid" requisitioning letters-of-marque under which to sail forth and harry the treasure ships on their desolate outside course from the Frozen North to Seattle or San Francisco. As a business proposition it didn't look bad at that.

Naturally the Americans had something in the way of a secret service. Washington took its reports with a deadly seriousness. The wires burned with urgent orders on the strength of which all that season ambitious cruisers, gunboats and cutters steamed up and down the coast on responsible convoy duty—protecting the ships bearing Klondike treasure against ravage by the rapacious rover who lurked meanwhile in his Grotto, nor never once sought their gold.

"It cost me thirty-two good iron men, yes, sir, my own coin," Captain John will still gleefully tell the world. "But it cost them mighty near a million! An' think of th' fun I had!"
