Among the socalled settlers are one or two men, who did not find conditions as they expected, hence a great deal of discussion, with investigations, and articles published, which were quoted, far and near, in disparagement of the country. The facts of the matter are, that none of the socalled settlers intended to locate on farms. Those complaining were of the unemployed class, and the main protestor was out of employment, during two years, in London, England, and came to this country, on his own initiative. He was offered employment; but through physical disabilities and for other reasons declined same,

The so-called settlers were met by the manager of a private [corporation, and were provided] with homes and cleared gardens. They were invited, by a representative of the Immigration and Colonization Board, to enter any protests, either orally, or in writing, but preferred to make confidential reports to one who interviewed them-which were published; but failed in making any statement, publicly, with respect to their entry, or their treatment, either on the journey,
