day. Good conduct prisoners were being moved from the crowded buildings to the new women's penitentiary building nearby. With the transfer of these prisoners, it was expected that the guards would be able to gain definite control of 220 rioters who were not locked in cells.

Originally 110 prisoners were housed in a cell-less dormitory but, in the most violent outburst of the present disturbances, the overflow gang overcame their forty guards and released 110 prisoners from their cells. The guards found it impossible to hold the 220 loose men although they were able to keep them crowded into two corridors.

Inside these corridors, however, all furniture has been wrecked and fixtures smashed.

Temporarily forty guards were held by the prisoners but they were able to effect their release, officials said.

The next move of the prison officials following the transfer of the prisoners was expected to be to force the loose rioters, still yelling and screaming in their semi-freedom, into the cells vacated by the good conduct men.
