More Life In House of Commons.

That the new British House of Commons is to be a livelier chamber than for some years past is assured by events which have transpired since it opened this week. The Labor members, it may be expected, will be largely responsible for its increased vivacity.

The extremist, Newbold, has already been heard and, as was expected, made a radical speech. His avowed aim, even before election, was to forward the Communist movement, so little of a constructive nature may be expected from him.

Apart from Newbold, however, it is unlikely that the Labor strength will work in unison. There are moderate and radical Laborites and already the leaders of the party have displayed worry as to the actions of their supposed followers. Indications are that there will be just as much controversy among the Labor members themselves as there will be between them, as a unit, and the government. In unity there is strength and weakness comes in division. With such a division in the parliamentary Labor party there will be little danger of destructive legislation. However, the party will agree, perhaps, on certain moderate measures so their good to the government may yet be felt. In any case, they will keep up a close Opposition.

Trace Of Coalition May Still Remain.

With such a large element of Labor in the House of Commons, which is recognized as the Opposition, it is likely that the Conservative government and the Liberals will co-operate more than if they were the only two parties in the House. This prediction receives further support in the announcement by the government that the middle policies of the former Lloyd George administration are to be carried on in respect to trade and employment.

Any big divisions in the House, it may be expected, will come between Conservatives and Liberals united and Labor. With moderate Labor members occasionally siding in with the government, as may also be expected, it would also seem that these big and important divisions would be rather infrequent.

Liberal Party Coming Together.

As far as the British Liberal party is concerned it is apparent now that the two divisions, Georgians and Asquithians, will come together under the leadership of ex-Premier Lloyd George. There would be no object in having it otherwise. Perhaps, through this coming together, Lloyd George may rise rapidly again after his recent fall from power. The Moderate Labor may also come into the combination and what the results may be in such a case will only remain for future events to disclose. In any case a useful opposition, such as never will be provided by radical Labor, may be brought about. Looking at the British political situation from every angle it appears that the outlook is safe and that dangerous legislators will be held in check.

Spur Provided For Administration.

There is sufficient element of Opposition in the British House of Commons to spur to action the Bonar Law government which, if left to itself, might not be a very progressive administration. As it is, the new government so far has shown little indication of anything big or useful in the way of legislation. It was expected that it would be a quiet and strictly conservative administration and the events of a week go to bear out that assumption. A government often fails through too much energy but, on the other hand, it is certain that it cannot succeed with lack of it. That is one reason why the present British government may not be very long lived.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S BILL AIMED LARGELY AGAINST ORIENTALS

VICTORIA, Nov. 25.—A bill introduced by Hon. A. M. Mansour increasing the fines for offenses under the Factories Act seems to be aimed largely at the Chinese. Complaints have been made that employees of Chinese laundries work night and day, Sundays and other days under most unsanitary conditions. The new bill provides for fines up to $50 for offenses on conviction.

While white laundries have been subject to inspection and have been obeying the laws, those operated by Orientals have to a large extent escaped.
