NEW APPARATUS FOR RAISING WATER BY USING NATURAL ENERGY

Rising Tides May Be Harnessed and Irrigation Schemes Carried Out.

LONDON, July 12.—(Associated Press)—A water-lifting apparatus which seems to flout the natural law that water cannot run uphill, and which the tremendous energy of the rising tides may be harnessed for use by man, is an invention of Thomas G. Allen, graduate of Washington University, St. Louis, and now a British subject. The "Hydrautomat," as the apparatus is called, is the result of two years of experiments. A working model has been viewed by scores of engineers, some of whom have been baffled by the simplicity of the cycle of operation. It has lifted water 20 feet above the river level.

The hydrautomat is designed to raise water in any quantity from a running tream to any desired height without the use of standard equipment such as pumps, rams or water-wheels. The apparatus harnesses two natural sources of energy, the weight of a column of water and atmospheric pressure. By means of a series of tanks, one above the other, and a sluice-gate, which alternately brings suction and pressure forces into play, 80 percent of the energy of the pressure water used is obtained The height required is reached by carrying the series of tanks, alternating open and closed chambers together with air conducting pipes, to the desired height.

Unlimited Scope

It is believed there is unlimited scope for the hydrautomat on streams where hydraulic power development are not feasible because of the small amount of fall. One of the first applications is expected to be on irrigation projects.

In a broad sense, according to the inventor the purpose of the hydrautomat is to convert the contained energy of large quantities of water at a low head into that of a smaller quantity of water at a high head, or to compel a stream to hoist part of itself up over the land for commercial or agricultural purposes. The principal is fixed; the application is to be determined by local requirements.

World patent rights have been issued. It appears that in the world's inventive records the principle of the hydrautomat has been remotely approached, but never attained.
