Peace In Ireland Seems Still Far Off.

Troubles in Ireland are, apparently, resolving down again to the old basis of traditional quarreling in that country-Cathoficism versus Protestantism. Ulster, and Belfast city particularly, has once more become the storm centre and settlement with restoration of peace in the troublous Isle of Erin seems as far off as it ever was. Probably at no time in the history of that land have there appeared so many proposals for peace and have there been so many promises to that effect than have characterized events of the past few months but it is still questionable if the much desired end is much nearer in sight than it was twelve months ago. It is true that the political lineup has months changed considerably since the Free State status was offered by the British government with the division of the country into two self-governing commonwealths but certain factions in ; Northern Ireland chafe under that condition and Southern Ire- games ---land has been split into two distinct divisions-Free Staters and Republicans. Thus geographical division seems to be giving how remarkably quick the lady if they like him-in having him rise to much dissatisfaction. If all the Irishmen in Ulster were citizens got into their summer come to bide among them. In the opening of the Senior Base-Protestantswand all in Southern Ireland were moderate Catho- finery?
