Orme, serious consequences would undoubtedly have resulted. Becker, with his brother, was learning to swim and had been in the habit of walking out in the shallow pool up to his armpits and then striking out for the shore. Yesterday afternoon he was walking out but stepped off the ledge and fell into the deep water. He had gone down for the third time when C. H. Orme, noticing his danger, swam to his aid and grabbing him by the hair, was successful in getting him back to the shore. According to eye witnesses, Becker would certainly have drowned but for the prompt assistance rendered him by Mr. Orme. He was not much the worse for his sudden immersion.
