BOBOLINK IS SALVAGED

The Nelson Bros. Fisheries floating boat repair scow Bobolink was salvaged from Bacon Point on the north shore of the harbor this morning and towed back to the dry dock from which it broke loose, piling up on the rocks during last Thursday night's gale.

Relieved of her maze of machinery over the weekend, the Bobolink was lightened to such an extent that she could be floated, despite the holes in her bottom where she grated on the rocks during the storm.

The salvage job was directed by Norman Nelson, head of the company, who flew to the city on Monday. Repairs to her damaged hull will be made at the drydock.

The Bobolink, formerly a federal Department of Public Works river snag scow, had just had her hull re-caulked and copper painted before her lines snapped in the storm and she drifted across the harbor.

Ordinarily she is moored at the company cannery at Port Edward.

STILL USED TODAY

Sixteenth century armor manufacturers discovered that fluting metal gave it added strength and rigidity without adding weight, a principle used today with corrugated iron and steel girders.
