DESCRIBES ARCTIC MURDER CASE

A murder trial that was delayed three years and a voyage to the eastern Arctic was described to Prince Rupert Rotarians at their luncheon meeting Thursday by Rod MacLeod, Prince Rupert barrister who acted in defence of an Eskimo woman on the bleak shore of Baffin Island in 1945.

Attached to the legal branch of the army, Mr. MacLeod was borrowed by the Department of Justice to defend the Eskimo woman after the government had got "fed up" on paying the expenses of civilian lawyers who had been unable to reach Port Ross because of weather, during the previous two seasons.

Judge at the murder trial was a stipendiary magistrate, and the jury was composed of members of the crew of the Hudson's Bay Co. supply ship Nascope which founded this year.

"It was hard not to be able to discuss the case during the time we were northbound on the Nascope," Mr. MacLeod recalled. "But we were warned not to, because we might influence the jurymen."

Body of the deceased, an Eskimo man, who had been shot in his sleep as a result of an unsatisfactory exchange of wives, was in a remarkable state of preservation after more than three years. "In fact it didn't smell much worse than a living Eskimo," Mr. MacLeod said. It had been kept partially or completely frozen all that time.

The woman was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to one year in custody of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Pangnirtung, where she lived happily in a skin tent and an igloo during her term of penance.

"She had never been better off in her life before," Mr. MacLeod said.

He paid high tribute to the small bands of white men and women who live in the Arctic outposts, sustaining law, religion and Canadian sovereignty over the sub-polar wastes. Many of these people love the territory and return for successive terms of service.

Mr. MacLeod was thanked for his address by club president Lee Gordon. Guests at the meeting were Col. C. Strong, Vancouver; Leonard Cripps, Vancouver; Fred Gulland, Prince Rupert; W. H. Philpott, Vancouver; Judge W. O. Fulton and C. B. Howe.

MEN POUR AT MOOSE BAZAAR

There were a good number of people on hand at the Moose Temple Bazaar yesterday to see Bill Terry and Doug Wood pour tea from a silver tea service and to be waited on by George McWhinney and Don Jensen. Daintily adorned with pink trimmed aprons the men presided at the urns from 2:30 to 5:30 p.m.

Although the tea-pouring ceremony was the chief attraction from some angles, the ladies of the lodge held a very successful sale of home-made candy. Mrs. Casper was in charge of the booth assisted by Mrs. Bond, Mrs. Muncey and Mrs. Hougan. Prizes raffled during the afternoon were a box of apples, 3 pairs of ladies hose, a chicken and a home-made cake.

In the evening, at the Moose Temple the crowd was entertained with a variety of games arranged by men of the Moose Lodge. All prizes won at the bazaar were donated by merchants of the city.
