Negotiations With Germany Over Commercial Treaty are Off Owing to Differences

BERLIN, Sept. 25.—Negotiations between Germany and Britain over a proposed treaty of commerce have collapsed. Secrecy is maintained on both sides but it is believed the main reason for the breakdown of discussions was the German refusal to grant Britain exemption of taxation on imports. On such goods the German tariff now being prepared will be practically prohibitive.

Premier Ramsay Macdonald Says he is Often Sick of Party Politics Would Put Honor of State First

Men of different views and diverse conceptions should put the honor and reputation of the state ahead of party, according to Right Hon. J. Ramsay Macdonald, prime minister of Great Britain, speaking at a dinner at which he was entertained by the town council of his native town of Lossiemouth, Scotland.

Responding to the toast of his health, Mr. Macdonald said that for the first time Labor had given a prime minister to the British Empire. None of them would ever know how terribly risky the experiment was—the leader of a minority faced with problems the like of which in their number, in their complexity, and in their critical character had never, he thought, faced a Prime Minister. It was a very risky step to take, but "once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide." The decision was taken. He hoped that whatever was to happen, it would be said that as the result of that experiment the way was made smooth for whoever was to follow them. They knew the many troubles he had had—the tragic entanglements of Europe, defying apparently everybody who tried to disentangle them, ill will, suspicion, and unwillingness to change, almost an impossibility to get people to approach the problem in a new frame of mind.

Immense Burden
Any one of those problems was a burden quite heavy enough for one pair of shoulders to bear, but the Government had had them all, and all at the same time. All he could say was: "We may have come in by accident; perhaps we did. We may have come in by luck; perhaps we did. I am not concerned in answering those questions, but the only thing I am concerned with is that we are there, and that whoever is there has to do his best to solve those problems in accordance with British honor and with British security and peace. Never did this country want men more than it wants men now. I sometimes get sick and tired of party politics. I get sick and tired of that method of controversy which is dishonest and which people of all parties indulge in, knowing very often that it is dishonest. The only way that the State can be guided in safety through its difficult days is for men of different views and of diverse conceptions to put the honor and reputation of their State first, and everything else afterwards."

No Longer Colonies
The empire itself, in the course of generations of evolution, had reached a time when it was no longer sufficient for somebody to be in the Colonial office or in Downing street to issue edicts, and say, "You are our colonies, our children, our dependents," but an Empire of self-respecting, self-governing, liberty-loving Britishers requiring the machinery of government of a totally different character, requiring somebody to solve the problem of how self-governing nations might cooperate without losing self-respect—that problem had not yet been solved, and it had been the fate of the Government to have to face it in its first phases.
Ireland that never slept, Ireland that seemed to defy every one who touched it, to-day was as troublesome as ever it was—Ireland, which nevertheless he was determined, if he could succeed, to keep out of the arena of party politics.
India had also reached the stage of evolution when she was beginning to offer the statesmen of this country that great problem of self-government within the Empire, of liberty which was not independent, but which, nevertheless, was experimental, which was satisfactory. Egypt, endowed with independence of a partial character, and yet surrounded by some thorny problems of administration. In Russia—it was almost unsafe to mention the word, because there were still newspapers out for "stunts" rather than for the truth—in Russia they had to solve a problem which was confronting not only this country, but the whole civilized world, and one which we could not afford to overlook.

FAMOUS WALKER APPROACHING

W. H. Chapman, Octogenarian Pedestrian at Terrace Monday and Remo Tuesday

TERRACE, Sept. 25.—W. H. Chapman, the famous walker, who is just completing a sixteen thousand mile hike, arrived in Terrace Monday afternoon. As he is two months ahead of his time limit he is able to take things easier on this last lap. His feet were beginning to trouble him so he had only come the fifteen miles from Usk that day. Tuesday he left for Remo, choosing the nine mile trip over the road in preference to the shorter distance by rail. Where possible he likes to do this, not only because of the easier walking but he is enabled to see more of the country.

Mr. Chapman's long hike originated in a bet between the editor of The American Magazine and a couple of millionaires as to the relative merits of young and old under such a test. The two young men who started with Mr. Chapman soon dropped out of the contest, but Mr. Chapman has kept doggedly on till his goal is now less than ninety miles away and the five thousand dollars almost won.

Mr. Chapman has found the section crews very hospitable and has spent many a night with them. This is only one more adventure in a very full life. He was twenty years in the U.S. army. He served as a scout under Buffalo Bill and was killing Indians at the time of the Custer massacre. He also served twelve years in the navy and has visited every part of the world.

Mr. Chapman thinks this is a fine country but doesn't see much opportunity for its further development till there is a better system of roads. He expects to arrive in Rupert next week.

W. H. Heidman of the Golskoish mine near Anyox passed through on the Prince Rupert yesterday afternoon returning north after a business trip to Vancouver. His son accompanied him.
