BLACKWOOD on Bridge

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

For Winning Tactics, Open Light With Partial

None of the text-books gives more than a passing nod to the situation where your opponents have a part score. I don't know why this is, because it seems to me the lucky stiffs always do have a nice fat partial and therefore a knowledge of what to do in this situation assumes real practical importance.

My mail indicates many players hold to the idea that you need more to open the bidding when your opponents have a part score than when they do not.

Just the opposite is true. It is winning tactics to open lighter, at least when you are dealer or second hand.

With an advanced partial, your opponents can go out with a bid of one no trump or a bid of two in any suit. Now, if you and your partner have any reasonable chance of contesting the bidding, the time to start is now.

Get in there first with an opening bid—before your opponents have had time to get together and find out that they can double you.

Sometimes you will find partner with nothing. In that case you can get out of the bidding fast. Let them play the hand and fill out their game. There is nothing you can do about it.

At other times you find your partner with enough in high cards or distribution to make a real fight out of it. The point is, you want to start looking for a sensible sacrifice spot at a time when the risk of doing so is at a minimum.

In today's deal, for example, if Mr. Masters had passed as dealer, Miss Brash would have opened with one heart, which Mr. Abel would have raised to two.

Then Mr. Masters would have had to come in at the three level—or stay out of the auction entirely. His side would never have found the admirable sacrifice at five diamonds which was set only one trick. A very cheap save when the opponents were cold for four hearts.

First Recording Made Of Mad Whale's Heart Beat

SEATTLE (AP)—The heart beat of a small but maddened, thrashing whale with two harpoons stinging its flanks has been recorded on an electrocardiogram.

The recording made from the giant mammal—a Beluga (white) whale—was similar to those of elephants and humans but more nearly resembled an elephant.

This first known successful tracing of a whale's heartbeat on a chart was reported Saturday by the men who conducted the tests in small motor boats on Alaska's Bristol Bay.

They were Dr. Robert L. King of Seattle and Dr. Paul Dudley White of Boston. Both men are heart experts. They believe a study of the recording may give information which will help determine what the normal heart tracing of a large human being should be.

The recording was made from a harpoon tied to an electrocardiograph in one of the boats and containing in its point the metallic contact normally placed on the skin in human diagnosis.

Late Thursday two harpoons thudded into the fat sides of a 15-foot-long, 2,000-pound mammal. The whale plunged downward, came to the surface, thrashed about and plunged beneath the surface repeatedly. It pulled the small boats wildly around the Bay.

The occupants hung onto the gunwales for dear life—all except James M. Jenks, president of the Sanborn Company of Cambridge, Mass., makers of the electrocardiographs. He huddled over the machine in the heaving boat, working desperately at its controls.

Thirty minutes after the wild ride started, Jenks shouted "we've got it."

The galvanometer had picked up the whale's heart action and the movement of the galvanometer was photographed by a camera built into the machine.
