British Budget is Popular but Conservatives Object to Dropping of Imperial Preference Policy

LONDON, April 30.—This morning's newspapers of all shades of political opinion generally concede that the budget introduced by Philip Snowden, chancellor of the exchequer, is a very clever one, and one which on the whole is bound to be distinctly popular throughout the country.

The Conservative press gives expression to the fears that the dropping by the government of imperial preference will be resented by the Dominions. The Morning Post says it is a staggering shock to the Empire and that the ensuing disappointment, embitterment and dissension within the Empire must be borne by the combination of parties which fathers this reversal of policy.
