JAY WALKING COMMON IN CITY OF BERLIN PEOPLE RESENT CHANGE

Motor Cars are Appearing in Large Numbers and People Talk Back at Traffic Cops

BERLIN, Nov. 6. — Germans are the greatest "jay-walkers" in Europe. Automobiles have been so few in the larger German cities, and for the most part the streets are so broad, that pedestrians have paid little attention to traffic. Accommodating drivers have limited their speed and movements to suit the public, which walked all over the streets.

But the times are changing. With the stabilized mark motor cars are appearing in large numbers, and the German cities have been forced to study methods practiced abroad in controlling traffic. Several police officers have recently returned from the United States and England, where they observed modern methods of control.

Already in Berlin the police have instituted reforms, but as the officers entrusted with traffic control are inexperienced, the first effects have been a decided slowing down of pedestrians and motor traffic on crossings in the central section of the city, and much dissatisfaction.

The control is still in the arguing stage. Motor car drivers argue with the crossing policemen and the policemen talk back, while impatient pedestrians and lines of vehicles await signals to move.
