Hushing up Process Seems To Be Resented.

There is a great deal too much hushing up of unpleasant things among those who can afford to pay people to keep quiet. This is well illustrated at Vancouver where a girl was shot through the head and buried after a verdict of accidental death had been brought in by a coroner's jury.

In many parts of the country the coroners' juries seem to be under the dominance of the coroner. Unpleasant things are usually hushed. The proper cause of death is seldom given and the result is disastrous to the coming generation.

In this Vancouver case it is satisfactory to know that a further investigation is being held and that if there is criminal action, the criminals should be brought to justice.

Fear Causes Much Of Present Injustice.

Fear is the cause of much of the injustice in the world today. People are afraid to tell what they know. Take as an instance a man who dies as a result of the use of drugs. Out of respect for his family the real cause of death is usually hushed up. He died of heart failure or some such reasonable cause, according to the doctors. If it was known that people died from the use of drugs, fewer people would become addicts. Publicity in this case is advisable. Protection of the individual's family is at the expense of the morals of the nation.

So it is with venereal diseases. No one is ever reported as dying from them, yet they are most fruitful causes of disease and death. We are too careful of the individual and sacrifice the race for his sake.

Revival Imminent In Lumber Industry.

Already there are signs that the lumber industry is reviving. One of the periodic periods of low prices caused by over-production will be followed by a period of higher prices and greater activity. That is always the case. The lumber industry is subject to many fluctuations and as a result mills are closed and men thrown out of employment.

Just now there is an indication that buying will commence soon. Already activity is reported and before long the demand should be strong. This will affect the north as well as the south.

School Attendance Indicates Trend.

A trend of the times is indicated by the school attendance. The population of Prince Rupert is on the increase. That is clear. With about seventy more pupils this year than last, we are certainly on the up-grade.

Reports seem to indicate that there are very few empty houses in town. Any desirable residence is taken at once and there is a demand for more. During the past week the business office of this paper has been deluged with inquiries from people wanting rooms or room and board. As we are not running an agency of that kind we had no information except that contained in the advertising columns of the paper.

Every tendency here seems to be toward a more permanent class of resident. Many come here now with the idea of making homes instead of sojourning for a time and then migrating. The pioneer stage of development of the city has passed. Business is fairly good here in most lines and only those who hold real estate for speculation are complaining.

Prince Exploited By Newspapers.

The Prince of Wales is exploited by the newspapers of this continent, much to his disadvantage. In their search for copy, reporters are recording the most minute acts and moves of the young man so that at times he appears ridiculous. People all read about him, either appreciatively or otherwise and the result is hardly beneficial to the future of the system.

The young prince is still very popular everywhere he goes. This popularity is taken advantage of to exploit him as a news feature and he suffers accordingly.

Two Captains in One Boat

Being an account of a trip to the Eestall River as recounted by Newton Pullen of Victoria under the nom de plume of Marcus Drexell in the Victoria Colonist. The next article of the series appears soon.

VISIT TO DUNSMUIR MINE AND CLEARWATER.

The Gwen had been jammed on the submerged logs of the Eestall just below Johnston Creek from between five and six o'clock in the afternoon until after ten o'clock the next morning, and we were glad to tie up a short distance down the river and get ashore. The spot where we moored was at the end of the abandoned narrow-gauge railway leading up to what is known as the Dunsmuir Mine, a copper property which has been bonded several times by the Granby interests and has had considerable development work done upon it.

Things aboard the Gwen were not exactly shipshape. They were in fact, rather messy, for our varied belongings had suffered in the excitement of the last few hours. We had wandered about the craft in our high rubber boots after standing in the river. We had tracked mud aboard, had dripped water aboard, had leaned on things that should never have been leaned on, and had generally comported ourselves in a fashion detrimental to the welfare of inanimate squashable articles. Packets of cigarettes had been tucked away under one of the seats for safety. We found them floating about serenely in water which had made its way into the boat. Food had been stepped on, the apricots were suffering from common assault and persistent jostling, but the eggs had come through remarkably well.

We Got Wet Again

Rain began to fall as we were cooking lunch under a tree. It rained on and off for the rest of the day. We knew that it was possible to walk in to Johnson Lake from there, but we did not know where the trail began. It was Johnson Lake that we had been heading for when some submerged logs changed our plans, and we were hopeful that we might yet reach that beautiful spot by land. However, we were again doomed to disappointment, being unable to find the proper route. We tramped up the narrow-gauge line through wet underbrush that soaked us, and we found the abandoned camp used during the development work had been carried out. The railway went as far as a rushing stream which flowed over a reddish bottom. We pocketed some ore samples and made our way back to the Gwen.

To Clearwater

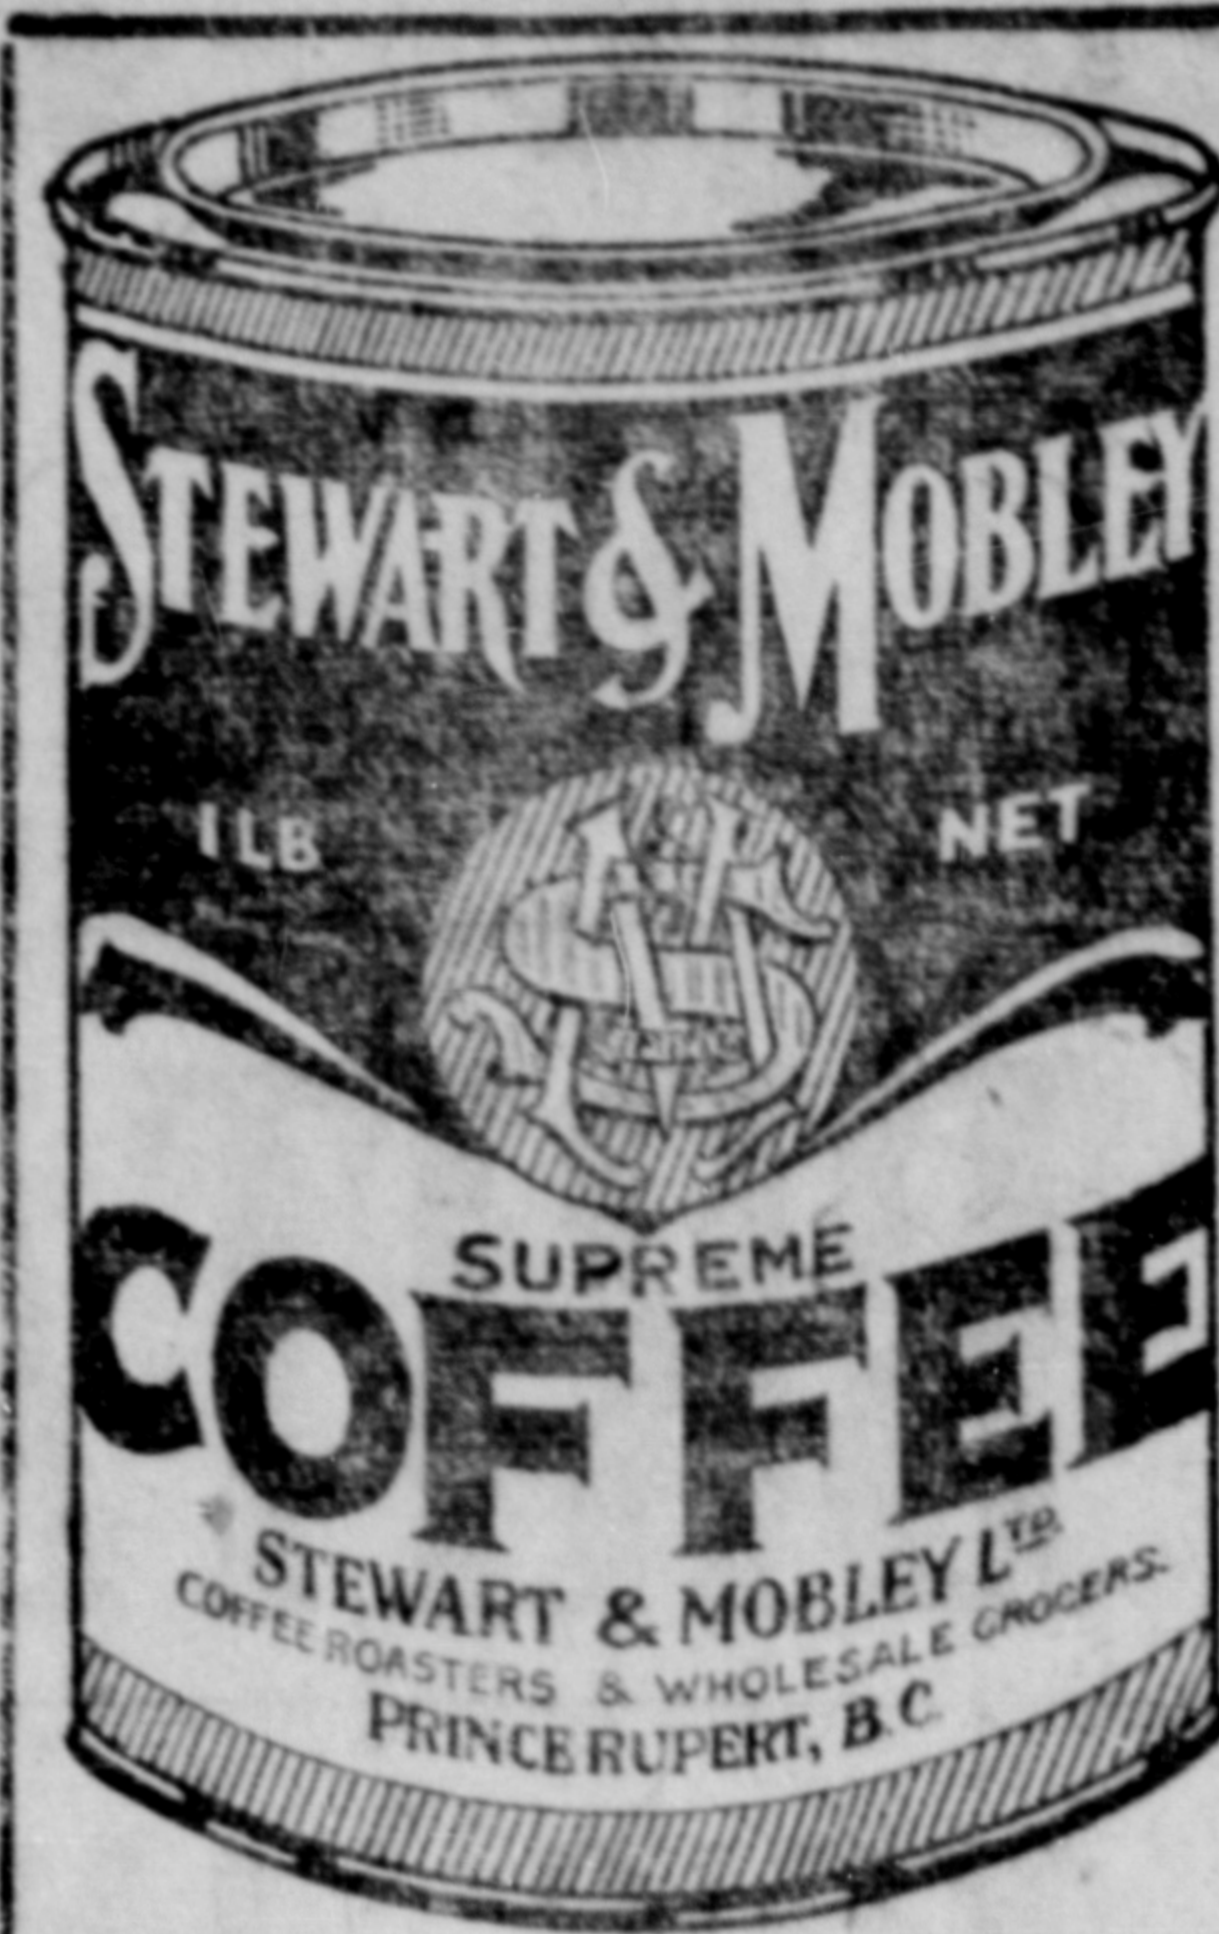

After supper the rain has stopped and so we decided to move along Clearwater Creek. As the Gwen shoved her nose confidently down the river which wound away between the lofty summits, we felt the spell of a calm evening and were at peace with the world. Several times we scraped the bottom but managed to keep moving until we reached deeper water.

The moment that we turned into the mouth of Clearwater Creek we knew why it bore that name. The water was crystal clear right down to the grotesque stumps and rotten trees that sat in the mud of the bottom. At slow speed we ran up between the narrow banks about half a mile and tied up the Gwen not far from the foot of some rapids. On either side of the entrance to the Clearwater a mountain stood in its immense bulk as if it were there to guard the peace of the valley against violation. Off in the woods a whistle sounded like a traffic policeman in a big city. This was a ground hog, but it might have been the mayor of paradise giving his address of welcome.

Other Captain Explains

In our canoe we paddled up to the rapids; turned into a narrow slough where the trees leaned out to look at themselves in the still mirror; and then slowly glided down to the Eestall and back. If it were possible for a hefty man with several days' whiskers on his face to become ecstatic, I would say that the other captain was ecstatic that night. He was not sufficient of a poet to speak of a silver pathway to contentment, or anything of that description, and so he simply breathed deeply and exclaimed at intervals, "Say, this is great," and "My, this is certainly worth while."

We slept in the bottom of the boat that night, the Other Captain in the bow and myself in the stern. The rain collected in a little reservoir somewhere and at intervals it overflowed onto my head and pillow, but although it woke me up each time I was never quick enough to find out where the waterfall originated, and so could only turn over my pillow and go to sleep again. Finally, perhaps, after a period of long years the timber is cut and the public asserts its further demands in addition to the carrying charges by claiming thousands of dollars cash or royalties fees.

Last year the Government collected one and a half millions of dollars in royalties alone before the material that paid that amount was placed on the market.
