BLACKWOOD on Bridge

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Check All Suits—Then Plan Strategy

When you are playing a hand as declarer, I have recommended that you check on each of the four suits in turn before deciding how to proceed. This principle applies with equal importance to the defenders' play.

On defense, don't let yourself become fascinated with the play of one particular suit, giving all of your thought to that suit. It may well be that this suit only appears to be the vital one and that the key play on the hand actually lies elsewhere.

Take today's deal, for example. Mr. Abel opened the six of clubs and Mrs. Keen played her lone ten. For whatever value it might be in giving the enemy a garbled picture of his true distribution, Mr. Dale false-carded by winning with the queen.

Mr. Abel asked for a second look at the trick and therefore gave his complete attention to the club suit. Obviously Mr. Dale had the king left. But how many others? If he had started with king-queen alone, the defenders could run the rest of the suit as soon as they got in.

If he had started with K Q 5 then Mrs. Keen now was left with the lone jack. That would create a problem. If she got in and led the jack of clubs, Mr. Dale could simply duck.

Mr. Abel couldn't overtake without setting up Mr. Dale's king. And if he didn't overtake, Mrs. Keen would have no more clubs to lead.

As these and other thoughts and theories concerning the club suit coursed through Mr. Abel's brain, Mr. Dale led the eight of hearts. From his trance Mr. Abel played the trey. The five went on from dummy and Mrs. Keen won with the queen.

Mr. Abel eagerly awaited the club return. But it would have taken a magician to lead a club from the East hand at this point. Mrs. Keen returned a small spade and Mr. Dale won with the queen.

He finessed hearts again and ran off four tricks in the suit. He made a total of 10 tricks in all. Suppose Mr. Abel had forgotten about clubs long enough to go up with the king of hearts on the first lead of that suit. Then Mr. Dale would not have made four no trump. He wouldn't have made three no trump either.
