UNITED STATES ANCIENT DEBT

Proposal Made by Newspapers of That Country to Clear up Indebtedness

An Eastern Canadian newspaper says:—Several of the leading newspapers of the United States have been discussing the debts of the southern states that were repudiated shortly after the civil war, and are urging that, in making settlement with European nations of present war debts these old debts should be paid.

The money is mostly owed to Britain—some $60,000,000 with interest. These debts, which were repudiated, were not the debts of the rebel south, as too many people in the United States like to suppose. They were not that at all. Those who take the risk of lending money to a people in rebellion expect to lose if the cause fails. After the war had ended in the defeat of the south money was required in the work of reconstruction, and the governments of several states borrowed freely in the London market.

At that time Washington was taking a hand in reorganizing the south, and her agents were called carpet baggers. Later on, when these different states recovered control of their own affairs, they censured the mismanagement of the carpet-bagger, and refused to repay these borrowings. There was no means by which the creditors could collect.

Creditor Nation

Now that the United States is a creditor nation, anxious to see France, Belgium, Italy and other nations pay—anxious that none of them should stoop to the had expedient of repudiation, it is found extremely awkward to be confronted in the press of Europe with the story of the repudiated debts of certain of the United States. Several leading newspapers urge that in international war debt adjustment these long evaded debts be faced and paid, as they ought to be. But it takes a great deal of newspaper talk to persuade Uncle Sam that he ought to "pay for a dead horse." He would like to do it for the looks of the thing, but, having been poor in his youth, he hates to part with money.

LIFE HISTORY HUGE SALMON

Eighty-Five Pound White Spring is a Five Year Old Babcock Says

SOME TAGGING RESULTS

VICTORIA, Oct. 6. — Just how the eighty-five pound salmon caught recently in the Straits of Juan de Fuca managed to reach its enormous size was explained by John P. Babcock, leading Canadian fish authority and deputy commissioner of fisheries for British Columbia in a statement issued after he had examined the monstrous specimen.

Expert's Statement

"The eighty-five pound white spring salmon which was caught in a trap in Juan de Fuca Strait last month is shown, from an examination of its scales submitted to me, to be a five-year-old fish," said Mr. Babcock. "Like most of the other record weight spring salmon, it is of the 'sea type,' that is, it left fresh water early in the spring of its first year and passed virtually all of its life in salt water. Ordinarily most spring salmon spend their first year in fresh water and migrate to the sea in the second spring of their lives and live in the sea for three or four years. Those that spend one year in fresh water grow but a few inches in length during that period. On reaching salt water, they find food much more abundant and grow rapidly.

"This eighty-five pound fish migrated to sea soon after it reached the swimming stage and therefore grew much more rapidly the first year than it would have done had it remained that year in fresh water. Having lived in the sea for five years—one year more than the average—it was enabled to grow to greater weight than is usual to the individuals of its race. While it is close to the record, if not the record spring salmon taken in British Columbia waters, it is not the record on the coast. Spring salmon weighing over ninety pounds have been taken in the Columbia. This eighty-five pound fish, however, must have been a glutton—a regular Falstaff.

Roam Long Way

"And talking of salmon, some very interesting tagging experiments have been conducted by the Biological Board of Canada on the west coast of Vancouver Island and Northern British Columbia this past summer. Some hundreds of spring salmon that were caught by trolling were tagged and liberated. Metal tags, each bearing a separate number and the letters 'B.C.' '25' were fastened in their flesh near the base of the tail. They were tagged and liberated in order to trace their movements and gain additional data as to growth. Several of these tagged fish have been caught in Puget Sound and Fraser River waters, as was naturally to be expected. Several others were caught in the Columbia River. The record traveler of them all, however, is the one, just reported, caught near Pittsburg on the Sacramento River, in California. That fish appears to have wandered farther than the one that Dr. Gilbert tagged for the United States Bureau of Fisheries on the southeastern side of the Alaska peninsula in 1923, that was recaptured in Siberia that fall.

Authorities Co-operate

"It will be recalled that the fishery executives of the United States, Canada, British Columbia, Washington, Oregon and California met in Seattle last March and organized for uniform investigations of the Pacific salmon. One of the measures adopted provided for the tagging of salmon in salt water from Monterey Bay, California, to Alaska, during the past summer. The first returns of that work are just coming in, and while it is too early to reach any definite conclusions, those marked off Vancouver Island that have been recaptured in the Columbia, and the one caught in the Sacramento, indicate at least, that some spring salmon from those rivers are at times associated on the west coast of Vancouver Island with those from Puget Sound and the Fraser. Further developments are anticipated, as many of the fish tagged were small, in their second year, and will not mature for two or three years."

NELS JOHNSON IS SENT SOUTH

Gets Six Months at Okalla Prison for Being Drunk

Nels Johnson, logger, well known character about town of Scandinavian nationality and familiarly referred to as "King Haakon," appeared once too often in the city police court this morning on a charge of intoxication and was sentenced to six months at Okalla Prison by Stipendiary Magistrate H. F. McLeod. The chief of police stated that Johnson had been given many chances but nothing could be done with him. It was his (the chief's) desire that he be sent out of town and this request was met by His Worship.

Nels shambled from the courtroom protesting that he should be given another chance and asking what the police were doing about all the bootleggers in town. He continued his protestations after being locked in the guard room.

He will be taken south on the Gardena this afternoon in custody of Capt. George Ash.
