MACKENZIE KING DEFENDS ACTION OF GOVERNMENT IN REGARD TO CUSTOMS PROBE

ing secured the reforms which had been brought about, and I am told that as an additional recognition he was given an honorarium of $1,000.

Mr. Stevens: That is too small for a prime minister—

Mr. Mackenzie King: It was too small; they should have given him $10,000. My point is—

Mr. Stevens: —reflecting on a citizen who cannot defend himself.

Achieved Great Purpose

Mr. Mackenzie King: The point I am bring out is that Mr. Sparks at that late date was allowing it to be believed that he had achieved a great purpose, that he had done a great service to the association and to the country. That was in September, just at the time a general election had been declared. And then what took place? Mr. Sparks began to associate with my right hon. friend opposite, just as he is doing from the gallery at the moment. They worked together back and forth during the campaign and when the election was over, just before parliament was summoned, in order to make things difficult and complicated for the government, he supplied the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) with the information brought out in this way.

Mr. Meighen: Will the Prime Minister be good enough to explain what he meant by saying that Mr. Sparks was in association with me from the galley at the moment?

Mr. Mackenzie King: I have not been blind to my hon. friend's eyes.

Some hon. Members: Cheap!

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes, If my hon. friend wishes to follow these methods I will admit that they are cheap. The whole business is pretty cheap when you get to the bottom of it.

Wants Opportunity

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown to the House pretty conclusively that the government was determined by legislation, by regulation, by dismissal of officials and in other ways, to do all it possibly could to put an end to this smuggling business. The question naturally arises as to whether the government is to have the opportunity of continuing this work and carrying out the reforms recommended by this committee, or whether that opportunity is to be taken away altogether.

After speaking highly of Mr. Bureau's ability and past integrity, Mr. King said:

I may say that I have not talk with Mr. Bureau from some time before the day the investigation began until this very morning; I deliberately refrained from so doing, but I would like the House to know that I did have a talk with him this morning and of what was said by Mr. Bureau to me in conversation. Mr. Bureau expressed surprise that he had never been asked to go before the committee. He wished me to say when I spoke this afternoon, that if a judicial body properly constituted, were appointed, a responsible judicial body, not only would he wish to go before that body or any properly constituted tribunal, but he would welcome the opportunity of so doing, and he asks this parliament to grant him that opportunity. I ask my hon. friends, particularly hon. gentlemen opposite who are fond of the use of the word "British," who like to talk about British fair play and British justice: Are you now going to deny to a member of this parliament before final judgment is passed the opportunity of appearing before a judicial tribunal to answer any questions that may be put to him with respect to his administration of the affairs of a department over which he presided and which has been reflected upon in a committee of this House and in this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I conclude with what I started out to say. There are before this House at the present time two amendments to the motion that the House concur in the report which has been presented. I think the report should be concurred in. I think every recommendation in it should be carried out; I think they should be carriel out expeditiously. But I say this much further: I do not think the work of that committee should be allowed to cease just at a point that suits hon. gentlemen opposite.

Province of Quebec

Now I do not say that the action of my hon. friends opposite was designed to prevent inquiry elsewhere, but there is a certain chivalrous attitude that needs consideration in this regard. It so happened that hon. gentlemen opposite sought to focus this whole inquiry on the province of Quebec.

I am told there is more smuggling going on in the port of Vancouver than in any other port in the Dominion. I do not know whether that is the case or not, but I should like to be certain on that point. I should like it to be investigated. The port of Winnipeg has not been investigated.

An hon. member: What about Lunenburg?

Mr. Mackenzie King: The port of Toronto has not been investigated, the port of Halifax has not been investigated.

Mr. Mackenzie King: May I add this point. There are certain distilleries that not been investigated as yet.

What is the object of hon. gentlemen opposite? It is that they and their friends may again control the policies of this country; it is another device whereby those who favor higher and higher protection—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Party Politics

Mr. Mackenzie King: Hon. gentlemen may laugh but they know it. From the beginning to the close of this session hon. members opposite have sought in one way or another to get possession of the seals of office, in order that they might put their own policies into effect. But, Mr. Speaker, I come back to this point, that what this country is interested in at the present time is not party politics. The country is not interested in the game of party politics with respect to this great problem of reform.

I say, Mr. Speaker, the majority of hon. members opposite, whatever their proposed views may be, in their hearts of hearts, do not condemn the present Minister of Customs. If parliament stands for anything, it surely stands for fair play and justice, and I ask hon. members, when they are recording their votes on one or other of the amendments or on the main motion, to remember that every man who goes into public life sooner or later is certain to be subjected to the kind of thing to which my hon. friend is being subjected today. I say to hon. members, judge by the judgment wherewith you expect to be judged, "for with which judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured out to you again."

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mackenzie King: My hon. friends may laugh. They laugh at Scripture. They laugh at anything and everything, but they will find the truth of the words I have just uttered, because those words have stood through many centuries and will stand for many centuries to come.
