Pleasure Seekers
Cause Most Fires.

Provincial statutes and regulations make it compulsory for settlers clearing land to secure permits from forest officers before they can light fires for land clearing purposes during the fire season, May 1 to October 1. Similar statutes make it compulsory for logging operators and other industrial operations to secure certificates of clearance before they can operate steam units in the woods during the closed season. The regulations also indicate that such industrial operations must be equipped with certain fire fighting equipment and fire prevention appliances.

Such regulations are good and aim to prevent forest fires. Forest authorities state, however, that there has been a very decided improvement in logging operations regarding fire, and that now such industrial operations are only credited with approximately 7% of the 2,500 fires which sweep this province annually.

The same authorities, however, state most emphatically that the chief sources of fire in the woods of British Columbia are the individuals who frequent the forests on pleasure bent, such as the traveller, picnicker, camper, fisherman, hunter, and tourist who are held responsible for 40% of the number of fires which occur annually.

Should not All
Have Fire Permits?

If it is considered good business to make farmers and industrial operators take out permits in order to control the forest fire situation, then surely in view of the statistics published, it is equally important that people who frequent the woods for pleasure, who light camp fires and throw lighted tobacco and matches around promiscuously, should also be placed under permit.

Public education in the matter of forest protection is essential, but there is a certain class of citizen who can only be convinced of the necessity of forest fire prevention by a strict application of the law. If the law does not cover the situation, then it is time that it be changed.

Individual permits controlling the activities of citizens frequenting the woods would undoubtedly do much to solve the fire problem, and it is worthy of the careful consideration of those responsible for the administration of our forest resources.

The logger is spending thousands annually to keep down fire in his operation for the protection of his equipment and timber, and incidentally the people's equity in the timber which he is cutting. Surely then the law should be such that he will be protected from the fires which sweep into his operation, started by the careless smoker, camper, traveller, and others.

What of Tomorrow?

Suppose that you are called suddenly and tomorrow your chair is vacant? What of the days that will follow?

Will your vacant chair spell a double tragedy to those left behind? You cannot avoid the "summons" but you can avoid the lack of foresight which would leave them unprotected.
