A bent, old woman, dressed in the Mrs. Alexander for the Christmas sea- simplest of black clothes, is often seen wandering through the narrow thoroughfares of the quarter. Although locking herself in her cell every night and taking her frugal meals at the convent, Nathalie still keeps the right to take her daily walk through Paris.

There is nothing regal about her bearing now. Sorrow has creased her face. Divorced while yet queen, she was reconciled with Milan after his abdication had been forced upon him in 1889. She saw her son, Alexandre, who succeeded Milan to the throne, assassinated, together with his wife, Queen Draga, in May, 1903. With Alexandre, the last male in line, the House of Obrenovitch lost power to the House of Kara-Georgevitch, reigning in Jugo-Slavia today.

CONTINUOUS SORROW Nathalie left Serbia where her life had been one of continuous sorrow. She settled in France, choosing a place along the Basque Coast, overlooking the then only a pretty fishing port. There she built her palace, the Villa SPECIAL SAILING Sacchino, and there she lived and enjoyed her first real happiness. But the war took away much of her fortune, beyond her immense real estate holding, hundreds of acres of parked land just at the edge of Biarritz.
