EARLY MISSION CHURCHES DECAY

Catholic Pioneers in California Harassed and Discouraged by Indians and Government

LOS ANGELES, April 14.—Ruins of twenty-one missions in California, fast crumbling back to the earth from which they were reared by Franciscan fathers more than a century ago, are monuments to the blight of government opposition encountered by the Catholic faith in its relations with official Mexico. They were built in the first crusade of the church to carry the scriptures into the wilderness of the new world. Almost unendurable hardships were overcome in the establishments of these bulwarks of Christianity by missionaries harassed by hostile Indian bands, fronted by vast stretches of frontier as yet unsafe for the white man and forced to meet sickness and physical hardships with little to buoy them except the great courage and leadership of Father Junipero Serra.

Pioneer's Task
The task of these missionary pioneers had the wavering support of Old Spain and the slender financial backing of the Pious fund, contributed by church leaders in Mexico.

A century of courageous work followed the expedition that sailed for San Diego in 1769. Each of the missions rose to prosperity. Untold numbers of Indians were converted to the faith and taken within the protecting walls of the stately religious stockades. But all this time the mission stood within the shadow of ultimate destruction. At frequent intervals there was rumbling in official Mexico and hints that the government would not stand by while its territory in this part of the continent was colonized by the church.

Secularization
As early as January 1831 a decree of secularization was issued by the government at Mexico City. A change in governmental administration prevented this being made effective but in November 1834 the act of secularization was adopted by Governor Figueroa.

The prosperity of the missions began to wither and their decline gathered momentum with the march of time. The priests and the neophytes dropped away and one at a time the structures began to decay. Roofs fell in and drenching rains slowly washed the unprotected adobe walls back to the earth from which they came.

Missionaries Returned
Many years after secularization, a few of the missions were returned to the padres, but not until after their wealth had been dissipated and their grandeur clouded in decay.

A movement started some years ago by various organizations has resulted in restoration to some degree of the old mission churches but funds have not been available to save the greater number or to restore the church settlements to their former picturesque state. El Camino Real, the King Road, along which are many missions, has been incorporated into the state highway system through most of its length and mission sign posts—bells surmounting metal standards—have been erected at intervals to mark the trek of the padres in their journey northward.

The architecture of the missions—a mixture of Moorish, Spanish and Mexican, has been adopted by California as its own, and each year more buildings are conforming to this style.

TERRACE NOTES

Seldom, if ever, has a Terrace audience had the privilege of listening to a more eloquent speaker than on Tuesday evening when Walter McTave, internationally known orator and entertainer gave an address on the subject "Canadianizing Canada." Drummond and also selections from the poems of Robert Service were thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience present. Rev. T. J. Marsh acted as chairman for the evening.
