Fiery Poet Enlivens Proceedings in Case of Aimee McPherson

LOS ANGELES, October 9.—A fiery and voluble poet from Texas illustrated the dramatic nature of the proceedings in the Aimee McPherson criminal conspiracy trial late yesterday when he called the defence attorney a liar, haggled with the judge, skated close to arrest himself for contempt of court, and wound up with two sworn statements flatly contradicting the word of the accused evangelist.

The poet, Oliver Allstrom, bubbling over with an urge to be heard, said McPherson employed him to write a story entitled "Kidnappers" but called off when the investigators announced they had found evidence to prove her presence at Carmel with Ormiston while her body was being sought beneath the waves of Santa Monica beach.

Allstrom further charged that when Mrs. McPherson professed to the Grand Jury that she knew nothing about two men drowning while searching for her body, the evangelist had expressed regret to him over the drowning of one man, Ed Harrison, the diver.

The Attorney stated that a manslaughter charge against Mrs. McPherson and her mother might be laid as a result of the two drownings.
