TWO WARS BEING WAGED IN CHINA

New York Editorial Writer Who Has Just Arrived to Tell of Double Struggle

VICTORIA, May 6. — "Two wars are being waged in China," said Nicholas Roosevelt, editorial writer and special representative of The New York Times, who was a passenger aboard the President Jackson from the Far East.

For the past several months Mr. Roosevelt has been in China studying the economic and political conditions there. All through the winter he watched the warlords of the East battle, saw China seething with internal conflict and her people thrown into disorder and unrest. From what he has seen and heard he has concluded that there are outside influences at work in China.

Into Confusion

"The two wars are turning China into confusion. One is being waged under the surface between Russia and Japan for supremacy in Asia, and the other is between three Chinese super-warlords for the control of China, and especially for possession and enjoyment of the national revenue from import duties." Thus Mr. Roosevelt summed up the situation in China.

Each of these super-warlords, he said, is backed with varying degrees of loyalty by sub-warlords, governors or military directors of provinces, and each of these sub-warlords is the leader of a band of mercenaries, aggregating in all China considerably over 1,000,000 of armed and drilled soldiers.

Mercenaries Must Work

If peace and order are to succeed chaos in China, Mr. Roosevelt thinks, these super-warlords must merge into subordination to civil government or must kill one another off until a single will controls; and this 1,000,000 of mercenaries must disband and be put to work, a fraction being retained as a loyal national army and another fraction colonized in sparsely-populated Northwestern China, including Mongolia.

In the opinion of many persons of China, Mr. Roosevelt declares, the warlord Ghang Tsolin represents Japan and controls Manchuria, in convenient proximity to Korea and Japan. Warlord Feng Yu-Hsiang, believed to be backed by Soviet Russia, controls the mountain passes northwest of Peking through which some believe Russia will pour its forces, including Russian trained Chinese mercenaries, when the trumpet signal for advance sounds. The Christian general, Wu Pei-Fu, claiming to stand for China alone, is in retirement at Hankow, far up the Yangtze River, after his disastrous defeat in 1924. Since that time, however, he has come to some sort of alliance with General Chang, it is believed. He is collecting and extorting money to fill his war chests and is strengthening his military power and tightening his bonds between him and those who are behind him, the Yangtze River provinces, in preparation for a drive against his enemies in an attempt to regain his lost mastery of China.

General Feng is thought to be somewhere in Russia having suffered defeat at the hands of General Ghang and General Wu, who have formed some sort of alliance, Mr. Roosevelt believes. Feng was driven out of his stronghold at Tientsin during March. Chang went back to

Getting Worse

"Economically, China is getting daily worse," says Mr. Roosevelt. "It will continue to do so until the fighting stops. The railroads are gone to pieces. Communication, except by water, is paralyzed."

"Politically," he declared, "China is pure chaos. It will be many years before there is a settlement."

Mr. Roosevelt, son of a cousin of the great United States President, is one of The New York Times editorial writers and has been preparing data in China to send to his paper. He will write when he returns to New York a series of articles dealing with the situation in the Far East.
