HAZING NOT SO VIOLENT

BUT COLLEGE SOPHS STILL PUT THE FRESHIES THROUGH THEIR PACES

HALIFAX, N.S., Oct. 27.—While violent hazing has more or less passed out of popularity in Maritime universities, the custom of imposing various forms of restrictions or obligations upon the new students remains in vogue. As a result university towns witness the spectacle of youths of both sexes appearing on the streets in strange and bizarre attire.

In Halifax, home of Dalhousie University, with which is affiliated King's University, the "freshettes" as they term the first year girls, bowed to an edict from their seniors obliging them to wear boudoir caps and carry baby rattles whenever they appear on the public streets, the rattles to be dangled at the end of strings to ensure their appearance. The girls adhere strictly to the order and even the proud owners of wealthy dads and sporty roadsters never appear on the streets without their badges of scholastic humility.

The Dalhousie Freshmen fared differently. They were in due course haled before their traditional lords and instructed to wear, until further orders, straw hats of another day which were duly supplied by the sophomores. But there is a large and weighty freshman class and they looked unkindly upon such an innovation, the curfew on straws having long since been sounded. After certain deliberation they betook themselves to the campus where they made a pretty bonfire of the passe straws. Followed an epic struggle between the sophomores and freshmen from which the latter emerged victorious and so they go their ways serenely wearing whatever their fancy and finances permit.

At Mount Allison University, Sackville, N.B., the question of the relations between freshmen and sophomores was settled in a more modern and less sanguineary manner. The two bodies, equally matched, engaged in games of strength which offered plenty of opportunity for the seniors to vent their spleen on the newcomers if any was felt. The sophs won a flag rush then staged a tug of war across the Ladies' College pond. The losers would be pulled into the water. At the height of the struggle the rope broke in the midst of the soph ranks and half of them were yanked into the water. Unwilling to take advantage of fate, the remainder of the sophs also plunged in beside their comrades. Not to be outdone in sportsmanship the victorious freshmen, refusing to accept such an accidental victory, also waded in. After such a display of good-fellowship there was no barrier left between the two bodies of students.

At Acadia University Wolfville, freshmen and freshettes meekly submitted to a decree from the seniors that they wear straw hats and green ribbons conspicuously displayed. In addition to prolonging the verdant season in that manner and acknowledging their own verdancy, the newcomers must lift their hats or curtsey whenever meeting a sophomore on the streets.
