iterary Society was addressed by H. F. Making." The speaker explained that a newspaper was a commercial undertaking and had to pay its way else it went out of business. There was no magic way in which it could be kept going except by having the income equal or exceed the expenditures. It was operated primarily for the purpose of making profits for the shareholders. although those profits were usually

Mr. Pullen explained that there were really three distinct tiedes or professions connected with the issuing of a newspaper. There was the mechanical department operated usually under the Typographical Union, the business department which included activertising accounting and circulation, and the third department was the editorial department, in which the speaker was more particularly interested.

REWARDS SMALL

Telling more particularly of the work of the editorial department, Mr. Pullen explained that it was work in which the hours were long and the rewards small and a person going into it must be prepared to get a good deal of However the satisfaction was great if a person was interested in pub-Opportunities other walks of life, for making suggestions and urging improvements of reforms which might benefit the com-

One of the first things a young reporter was told was that he must be accurate. It was the aim of all newspapers but often the results seemed to indicate otherwise. The speaker explained many of the problems connected with the work and how they wer He told the students that everything had to be done very rapidly and there was little time for considerarevision. The surprise was were not more mistakes under these circumstances.

One of the difficulties in gathering news, it was explained, was to get people to tell things correctly. Naturally ult was that the newspapers blamed for inaccuracy.
