Thanking King For Proclamation.

A lot of people here are puzzled over why the British Parliament should thank the King for a proclamation recently issued. It is a matter of form. The King issued the proclamation on the advice of his ministers and they are responsible. If there is anyone wrong they are the ones to blame. By thanking the King for issuing the proclamation Parliament endorsed the action of the Government of Premier Baldwin, on whose initiative the action was taken.

Scenic Attractions Of Prince Rupert.

We have so often spoken of the scenic attractions of Prince Rupert that we have no intention of repeating it here. All we wish to do is to draw attention to the report which appeared yesterday of a speech made by Archdeacon Rix before the Rotary Club. He saw possibilities of a wonderful sunken garden on the old hotel site and the idea is a splendid one. It has all the makings of a delightful garden which would be a thing of beauty for the city. Even if it were kept up by some private person it would be almost equally useful as it can be seen from the walk above and enjoyed almost as much as if it were open to the public.

Fighting Shadows Common Amusement.

Yesterday a story was published about a Spokane man who fought his own shadow and landed up in the police court. He is like so many of his fellows, who are constantly fighting shadows. They get very much exercised over the wrongs committed by a political party, or a civic group or a neighbor but eventually it is discovered that he is just fighting his own shadow. His imagination has conjured up something which did not really exist.

Uniforms For Boys' Band.

The decision to raise money for the boys' band was a step in the right direction. If the boys are to be kept together they should have uniforms in order to make them look smart. They will take more interest in their work if they are encouraged and the provision of uniforms is one of the first necessities. It is to be hoped the people of Prince Rupert will be liberal in providing for them. The sum of $750 is needed.

Unusual Rain For Time Of Year.

The past few days have been very unusual. The almost continuous rains interfered with the normal activities of the people and were particularly hard on business. Happily everything comes to those who wait and the end of the rain, for the time being, came with a burst of sunshine this morning.

The difficulty with a rainy spell such as that of this week is that it seems to cast a gloom over the place. People imagine it will never cease and get low spirited and moody. Those who can be cheerful under such circumstances are benefactors to the community.

Birth and Life of British Gazette Published During General Strike in Britain

A copy of The British Gazette is just to hand, part of the final edition of that short lived paper which kept the British public informed on strike events and the news of the day during the recent general strike. It is an interesting four page paper gotten up in English style and one of the features is a story of its own career extending just a little over a week. Here is the story as told by itself:

At last the moment has come to tell the story of one of the most signal exploits and adventures in the annals of English journalism—the foundation in a day and a night of a daily newspaper, The British Gazette, and the multiplication of its issue within a week to the stupendous total of over 2,000,000.

Nothing like it has been done before, the world over. If the exceptional occasion provided the inspiration and the opportunity, it also imposed the severest disabilities. What was done represented a triumph of resource and determination over what might well have seemed insuperable difficulties. It is a triumph of which all who had part in it have a right to be proud, and one which has served equally well two great causes.

Attempt Defeated

It has defeated the attempt to keep the country in the dark during a formidable crisis in its affairs, and it has vindicated the Press against a new conspiracy to muzzle its freedom.

Let us tell the story, which opens on Monday, May 3, under the shadow of a general strike to be declared at midnight—a strike of which the master-stroke was to be the shutting down of the newspapers.

It was impossible to acquiesce in the prospect of a nation exposed to the interruption of the whole of its social and industrial economy, and at the same time deprived of its news, and of the one medium through which public opinion might find and express itself.

But what was to be done?

A Famous Letter

The government were alert to emergency, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer called to the Treasury on Monday the representatives of the Newspaper Proprietors' Association (representing the London Press) and of the Newspaper Society (representing the Provincial Press). But he obtained from the conference little comfort or encouragement. Its members were unable to agree to the suggestion that they should co-operate in the production of a common emergency news-sheet, and the conference broke up indecisively.

At this juncture, the editor of the Morning Post wrote to J. C. Davidson, M.P., the Deputy Civil Commissioner for London, saying that with the co-operation of the Government, he would undertake to produce a four-page bulletin paper, to the number of 100,000 daily, and suggesting that if there were any difficulty, the Government should commandeer some big newspaper office (that of the Morning Post or another), and order so many papers to be produced.

Meanwhile, the work of producing what promised to be the last issue of the Morning Post for an indefinite time proceeded. An emergency edition was sent out at 9 o'clock, and, as the mechanical staff did not strike until they had completed the regular shift, it was possible to produce at midnight a 20-page edition of the Morning Post, though its distribution was limited by the cessation of the train services.

The seed that had been sown by the editor's letter was germinating, and was to spring up presently with the swiftness of Jonah's gourd.

Must Play Part

At a hastily-snatched dinner on the Monday evening, the editor, the general manager and the managing editor agreed that the Morning Post must somehow play its part in the crisis that was approaching, and they drafted a formal memorandum for presentation to the Government, outlining a definite scheme of co-operation with the Government. It offered, if adequate protection were given at first 100,000 copies of a news-sheet a night, and to raise the output to 400,000 copies by the end of the week. It placed the staff of the Morning Post at the service of the Government, to work under its direction and authority.

Government Arrives

That night important visitors to the editor were announced.

ced; and into the editorial room marched the chancellor of the exchequer, Sir Samuel Hoare, J. C. G. Davidson, and a train of departmental officials. They had come to act on the suggestion of the editor's letter; to commandeer on behalf of His Majesty's Government the Morning Post; and to convert it off hand into a Government news sheet—The British Gazette. Sir Malcolm Fraser was put in charge as the direct representative of the Government.

The step about to be taken was a momentous one for the Morning Post, and hardly less so for the Government, who never before had taken responsibility for the production of a daily newspaper. In more than 150 years the Morning Post had but once intermitted its daily issue, and now not only were all its resources to be handed over to others, but its very name was to disappear.

Extreme Gravity

Only the extreme gravity of the occasion could have justified the innovation on the one side, and the self-effacement on the other.

The act of taking over having been confirmed by a cabinet minute, signed by Winston Churchill, the conference in the editor's room, with the technical hands of the paper present to advise, was continued until three o'clock in the morning.

What was the utmost that could be done with the plant and resources available? For the answer to that question everything depended on the attitude of the men employed on the mechanical side, especially the compositors.

At four o'clock in the morning on the fateful Tuesday, the general manager called a meeting of the machine room overseers, and put the case to them. All but the foundry overseer agreed to carry on.

A Crucial Test

Now came the crucial test—what would the staff of the composing room do? The printer—A. Turner, who was a tower of strength, a man of infinite resource and untiring energy all through the unexampled ordeal—was confident they would stand by the paper. Summoned by telegram and brought in by motor car at an hour earlier than usual, they were assembled in the composing room and addressed by the editor and the general manager. They responded heartily to the appeal to stand by the paper which many of them had served so long; but they felt it to be their duty to report to their union, the London Society of Compositors. Pending instructions, they started the setting of the first number of The British Gazette, and had got up five columns of matter when, at five o'clock, their representative came back to say that they were forbidden to touch the work.

There was nothing more to be said, and it seemed doubtful whether there was anything more to be done; for the production of a newspaper without anyone to set the type is impossible.

It was a situation charged not only with fatefulness, but with painful feeling. These old servants of the Morning Post were bound by long association and many memories to the paper, and were deeply attached to its fortunes. It was a hard and bitter choice that they had to make between the two allegiances; and not a few of them broke down under the strain.
