Nations Get to Know Each Other Better by Playing Games Together

Famous Tennis Star Tells of Effect of International Games on People

"There is a question I want to ask you," remarked John Tunis, when interviewing Jean Borotra, the French Tennis champion, in regard to the value of sport. "What about the mass of the people of France. They have not the same advantages as you in the matter of sport-"

"Ah, just so! Now you come to the point. Four years ago our national tennis championships were closed; that is, they were only for French citizens. Then we opened them to everyone. Today players from twenty different nations compete for our titles. French sporting enthusiasts flock out to the stadium at Saint Cloud by the thousands. And they are thousands of ordinary citizens. They see good sportsmen from many lands; in June last we had French. Danes, Americans, English, Irish, Scotch, Germans, Austrians, Czechs, Dutch, South Africans, Hungarians, Spaniards, Poles, Swiss, Indians, Egyptians, and Belgians all playing, and our spectators realized that the American or the German or the Dane is a good sportsman and a good fellow. Do you see the effect such an affair has upon the international consciousness of a people?

POOR SPORTS "Let me tell you of an impression made the other way. Several years ago America or to Australia. This winter the the world appeared. "Yes, I am an opour Suzanne Lenglen was in your coun-She was not well. Often I have told her: 'Suzanne, you are the one woman in the world who should never be ill.' She did an unfortunate thing. she defaulted to Mrs. Mallory, then the American champion. And for years you and all other Americans believed that she was a bad sport and perhaps also unconsciously that the French as whole were not sportsmanlike. Ah, yes you did. An impression of this sort takes years and years and many examples to erase. Do you not begin now to

The crowds were so large that on the last day the gates were closed an hour before the match And they were marvellous to a Frenchman, an enemy of their upon the field of sport; the audience as well as the players. GETTING AND GIVING "Why do I believe that? Because in a conference the statesmen of the various nations are usually trying to get something and give nothing. They are bound by few rules and consequently they feel able to take any advantage possible. But in the world of sport your sportsman does not take advantages. He wishes to play the game with his heart as well as with his body and his mind. You see the distinction? I could not accept a point in a close match that did not belong to me. I could not receive a doubtful decision because such a point taken would take away my power to concentrate for five minutes afterward. And this is no more true of myself than of any other sportsman in the world. Politics, even international politics, is like business. Someone must always win, someone must always concede a point here or a point there in order that none will lose out in the end. But sport is like sport and nothing else. We are not in sport impressed with winning; we are more anxious to 'bien jouer,'-how do you say it, to play the game. And if you play the game one can never lose!

That is the lesson I have learned in the past few years from international sport, a sport which has taken me nearly all over two continents, and is soon to take me over a third. W/HEN you sort out the soiled clothes from the hamper, try to decide which articles cost so little that you can afford to endanger them by washing them with anything but Lux.

Shirts, pyjamas, house dresses, the children's clothes, sheets, linens, - just think how quickly they total up to $100 or over.

You know how Lux saves your fine things. How it guards your pretty silks and chiffons, your soft woollens - keeps them always looking like new! Why not use it for the everyday things too?

Because they've learned it is true economy, the thriftiest women are now plunging the regular family washing, every stitch of it, into bubbling, penetrating Lux suds each week. Lux saves many, many dollars by prolonging the usefulness of both simple and costly fabrics.

In many homes Lux alone is used for the whole family wash, week in and week out, at a real saving.

You, too, will find that to use Lux for everything washable is cheaper in the end.

Use nothing but LUX for washday.
