OPTIMISM AND GOODWILL PERVADED ADDRESS FROM WILLINGDON AT BANQUET

town of Prince Rupert had produced two men who had won Victoria Crosses during the Great War.

The speaker pointed out to Their Excellencies that the province of British Columbia formed practically one tenth of the entire Dominion of Canada and the district tributary to the city of Prince Rupert comprised more than half of that tenth. Its area was 300 by 800 miles and it spread from Ocean Falls in the south to the provincial boundary in the north and from the Queen Charlotte Islands in the west to the Alberta border on the east.

INDUSTRIAL BASE

Undoubtedly Their Excellencies had heard, the Archdeacon said, that Prince Rupert was the base of a tremendous fishing industry on the North Pacific Coast. Prince Rupert Brand fish found its way not only to all parts of Canada but to the United States and the Old Country. Last year no less than one and a quarter million cases of salmon, valued at $15,500,000, had been produced in the district tributary to Prince Rupert while 27,500,000 pounds of halibut had been landed at the port during the year to an estimated value of $3,000,000. "And we have as yet only touched the fringe of it," declared the Archdeacon. "There are many kinds, beside halibut and salmon, capable of development." It was a manly and strenuous industry, declared the speaker, making men of any who engaged in it. Nor did it lack in romance, said the Archdeacon, as he went on to describe a night he himself had spent aboard a disabled salmon boat at the mouth of the Skeena River.

The district also had tremendous mineral resources. There was no place throughout the district where one could get 25 miles away from some important showing. There was Atlin and Dease Lake, the great Premier mine, whose manager had been a fellow passenger on the boat with Their Excellencies, and the promising Salmon and Bear River Valleys, Alice Arm and the great copper mine at Anyox, as well as countless other great showings along the coast and in the interior. So abundant was precious metal that it was said a prospector left a nugget with his handshake.

The tremendous timber resources of Prince Rupert district were also referrel to by the Archdeacon. The Empire, during the war, had sought over the world for suitable airplane timber and had found it in the Sitka Spruce of this district. It stood in abundance here as well as much other timber suitable for pulpwood, lumber, poles and the many other forest products. If proper conservation measures were invoked, it was said, there would be a supply for perpetuity in this district alone for all the wants of the nation. In 1926, 181,000,000 board feet of timber had been cut in Central and Northern British Columbia.

AGRICULTURAL OPPORTUNITIES

Agriculture was also a potential industry in the famous Skeena, Bulkley, and Nechako Valleys. Splendid opportunities presented themselves and already there were large herds and stock and waving fields of grain. Settlers were really making it go in these parts.

Also tributary to this port and district was the Peace River valley," the last rolling plains for free grant on the continent." That would be a great field of agriculture and a great block of it was owned by the province of British Columbia. It was not a wooded country but an open prairie of the finest land where fine cattle was being raised and the best wheat and oats one could imagine. The whole desire of the people of that country was an outlet to the west and the Pacific Coast and the Canadian National Railway and Prince Rupert was the natural way. There was of course, special pleading but engineers who had gone over the ground and the men of the trails believed this was the right direction.

"There is one other resource that I never fail to speak about, something that will gradually be better and better as time goes on," said the Archdeacon. "The greatest natural resource of Northern British Columbia is the beauty of its scenery—the most wonderful in the Dominion." The Archdeacon then waxed poetical and recommended to Their Excellencies that some day they should go as far as Skagway and beyond to the Atlin country. There they would see unrivalled scenery and a diversity of mining operations. "You have seen but a very little of the coast in the trip that you have completed today," he said. "It is a Norway tremendously magnified with fjords penetrating into the interior, long and wide, places of absolute and sheer beauty, with their mountainous banks, provoking awe and perturbation.

"When you decide to give up the business of listening to speeches such as this and signing orders-in-council, many of which you don't believe in anyway, our advice would be to you: come and build a bungalow on such as Lakelse Lake, bring your fishing outfit and do your shopping in Prince Rupert. You will be received with tremendous enthusiasm in this country where a Bishop is called "Bish" and an archdeacon "archie" and where they will give you a kindly and appropriate name which it might be out of place for me here to utter but which you would like as well as 'Your Excellency.'"

LORD WILLINGDON

Democratic and kindly Lord Willingdon had been undoubtedly impressed with the words of Archdeacon Rix and, when he smilingly arose to reply thereto, he was given a great and genuine ovation. His talk was of a pleasant conversational nature in which he betrayed that he was still an Englishman in spite of his world wide travels. He made a fine impression and his Prince Rupert audience was drawn to him with a rapt and understanding attention. He proved himself a bit of a humorist, too, and had many a good-natured sally.

"In opening, let me thank you, on behalf of Her Excellency and myself, for the extraordinary warm welcome you have given us all. I think you are the luckiest community I have ever met. Archdeacon Rix, I think, is the best propagandist I have ever listened to. I have begun to think that if I should come and build my shack, as he suggested, I would be living in the Garden of Eden with no forbidden fruit about.

"I have learned something today about your fishing and its immense industrial enterprise and it was with interest that I found that a first cousin of mine was largely interested in the industry. I have also been interested in your mining where, if I am to believe the archdeacon, I might have the good fortune of having a nugget stuck in my hand, and your wonderful timber resources. I don't want to talk politics but I am sure he is right when he sees the necessity of wheat produce being conducted through Prince Rupert in the future. Your wonderful scenery has also impressed me and I can assure him and you that I will come again as soon as I can and I will try to get Archdeacon Rix for my guide.

"Your weather today at least has not been particularly good and, if you realized the agony some of my party went through in reaching here, you would say that they were a very intrepid and brave lot. I hope to see a fine Easter Sunday tomorrow or I will think nothing of the two prominent clerics seated here at this table with us.

ACKNOWLEDGES RECEPTION

"Let me say that, though your weather may have been, the welcome you have given us here was by no means a damp one. Your enthusiasm was not dampened and we have already seen a great deal during our short stay with you. Particularly have I been interested in the inspection of Young Canada which seems to be fit and well in this part of the Dominion. This morning when I inspected your Naval Cadets and others and this afternoon when I called at the Catholic school I saw you had wonderful young people.

"I have seen your great elevator and a collossal enterprise seemingly built in advance of the times. You are all so full of confidence and optimism that you build for the future and everything comes out in the end. One thing you want to get is this country filled up with people so that your industrial and commercial capacity may be increased. Then, I say, there will be no doubt that even many more harbors than you now have will be required for the delivery of your production to the markets of the world. Let me phophesy that, in a few years' time, Prince Rupert will greatly increase in exports from industry and commerce. We have had an extremely happy time and we hope to come again soon when business at Prince Rupert will have greatly increased and conditions will be far better than they are today. You have had in Canada a number of extremely bad years but everywhere it is said that the country is on the eve of a real move forward. In that move forward, Prince Rupert will undoubtedly share and become a great port in future years." We hope to meet you frequently and, on behalf of myself and my wife, I wish once more to most sincerely thank you."

PRESENTATION MADE

After the Governor General had taken his seat, a happy event took place when Mayor Newton presented to Lord Willingdon a beautiful cariboo hide lamp shade illustrated with windows of Prince Rupert scenes. The gift was of particular interest, being typical of the north country and of the handiwork of the well known local artist, Morte Graig. "We are delighted with your kindly wishes" said His Worship, "and are glad to know that you have appreciated our reception. We wish to make this presentation as further testimony of our high regard and hope that you will take it back to Ottawa and display it prominently in your home so it may be a constant reminder of our respect and well wishes."

"I would like just to thank you, Mr. Mayor, and the citizens of Prince Rupert very sincerely for this beautiful gift. I have never seen an address, and I have received many municipal addresses in Canada, so extraordinarily graceful, original, useful and unique. I have discovered that my wife has already found a spot in our home to place it." Considerable merriment was arounsed when His Excellency further explained: "It will be placed in her boudoir so the Governor Geneeral will not see much of it."

Before the gathering dispersed, pretty little Miss Joan Watt was called upon to present Her Excellency with a beautiful bouquet of roses which Lady Willingdon most graceously received, insisting that she should more intimately greet the small donor.

MEMORABLE EVENING

The singing of "God Save the King" brought a memorable evening to a close, many persons present, before leaving, taking the opportunity of being presented to Their Excellencies.
