At the Canadian end, the ships will call at the St. Lawrence River ports in summer and at Saint John and Hallfax in winter. Although the expense of the present monthly steamship service presents a difficulty. yet the future need for tropical products makes it seem probable that the present contract between Canada and the British West Indies will eventually prove profitable to both parties. With the growth which is bound to take place in population, Canada will constitute a correspondingly better market for tropical products, leading to further development of the West Indies kild, in turn, permitting them to increase their purchases from Canada. Optimism concerning the future of this relationship is based both upon the rapid growth of this trade in the past and upon knowledge of the great natural resources of
