

a reservoir

LIKE the camel which stores up large quantities of water when it can, because the opportunity may not occur soon again, it is wise for mankind to store up some provision for the future during productive earning years.

The safest and easiest way to do this is to purchase a Confederation Life policy—a Guaranteed Pension Bond, for instance. Then you have a reservoir that no future hazard of fortune can empty.

An interesting pamphlet, "The Key to Happiness," will be sent upon request.

ENGLISH VIEW OF BIG FIGHT

London Times Critic Writes After Viewing Film Which is Shown in London

CRITICIZES REFEREE

Intimates That Dempsey Had Raw Deal in Contest Owing to Bias Against Him

Writing in the London Times of the big fight between Tunney and Dempsey a critic after viewing the picture of the contest says:

Broadly speaking, the film is an exceptionally good one because it is so clear and—as shown privately to a number of press representatives, at any rate—admirably timed as well. Though the record of most of that now notorious seventh round is magnificently clear, the actual time taken by Tunney to regain his feet is slurred over in the most astounding manner. No one who did not see the fight itself would have grasped fully the important fact that Dempsey's ill-luck in the incident was enough to have discouraged the greatest-hearted man that ever drew on a boxing-glove. In the first place, it is clear that in the seventh round—as indeed, in the six previous ones—Dempsey is boxing in his own way quite as cleverly and much more fairly than Tunney. Dempsey is alternating his animal-like springs into close quarters with a swaying from and slipping of many of Tunney's best and hardest punches. To anyone who understands the true inwardness of the Dempsey style of fighting, he is boxing with his head this time as well as with his hands and feet. He does, in fact, draw his man at last and get in, first, the blow that knocks all defence out of Tunney and then, with almost incredible precision and rapidity, three more blows, all but one, which is a glancing one, blows that would jar.

TUNNEY DOWN

Down Tunney goes into a sitting position, his left hand still clutching the lower rope. And, up to a point, the film is a clear enough revelation of the true situation. It is obvious, for one thing, that Tunney's claim that he could have risen and resumed fighting in four seconds is a preposterous one. He is for long after that brief respite a man whose mind is in a haze. He is, in fact, dazed, and, although an interruption of the film deprives one of any chance to check the referee's interrupted and apparently leisurely count, there can be little doubt that, after ten seconds in the same position, Tunney still is struggling hard to regain his full wits.

IN THE WRONG CORNER

Dempsey, after a momentary attempt to stand over his fallen opponent, gives way to the referee in a docile and disciplined manner and—here the absurdity of the rule involved is unluckily left unrevealed—retires to a distant corner. But not the right one! There he stands—so the eye-witnesses but not the film tell us—quietly, with his arms astretch and resting on the ropes. Seconds and seconds elapse, and the referee orders him to move to a neutral corner! However, after an amazing rest, and a still more amazing piece of luck and refereeing, Tunney does get up and spends the rest of the round racing round the ring, with Dempsey after him. Once, when giving up the chase, Dempsey actually motions to the "undazed" Tunney to come and have a fight.

Then, to make the first knockdown and the 15 to 20 seconds' rest all the more memorable, there comes a second knockdown and no respite at all in the eighth round. On this occasion it is Dempsey who is caught and sent to the boards by a beautiful counterblow from the champion, who, though well on the defensive, is still the first-class boxer. It is not a staggering blow, but Dempsey goes down, Tunney stands over him—and the referee starts to count. Up Dempsey gets, and the referee's lapse is quickly covered.

MATTER OF TACTICS

So much for the notorious seventh round and the scarcely less notorious eighth. It may be granted at once, too, that Tunney recovers well and outfights a palpably disheartened opponent in the two remaining rounds. Let it be granted also that Tunney all the time looks a beautifully built, magnificently cool, and really capable boxer. His left is first-class and his right shoots over with a swiftness that should emphasize the fact that Dempsey, when he chooses, can box as well as fight like a champion, for the number of misses is considerable. What does reduce the value of Tunney's success, and particularly his advantage on points in the first five rounds—Dempsey does not fairly get into his stride until the sixth—is the fact that Tunney's holding with the right every time that his opponent rushes him is so outrageous that no English referee would have tolerated it for more than a round. Tunney, though, as one must admit, always a fine boxer, even resorts to arm locking that makes the referee's reproof of Dempsey for using the rabbit punch appear almost ludicrous.

SPORT CHAT

War is hell writes Billy de Graves in the Edmonton Bulletin. If you don't believe it, ask Chief of Police Shute. Chief Shute is nothing if he isn't a hunter, and when the honkers come down from the north, the Chief oils up the trusty twelve gauge, arranges for a holiday, and gets out into the great open spaces where men are men and the duties of a police chief are thrown into the discard. But sometimes where the hunters are the geese ain't, and that accounts for what happened last week. For two days the chief and a friend had been out in the goose feeding grounds, and never a honker had they seen. Then one day they saw the coveted birds feeding in a stubble field, and marked it for their own. That night the chief and his friend went out to the field, dug a pit, carefully covered it over, set out their decoys, and sat down to wait for the geese.

Now the chief prides himself on his decoys. They're not ordinary decoys. In fact they have sometimes deceived the mother and father of all geese, and that is what the chief hoped they would do last week. At any rate they looked lifelike and realistic enough, and that is what two city hunters thought, when, in the early morning, they came into the field and saw the carefully planted decoys. Bang bang and bang, bang, bang, went their guns. Decoys were shot down right and left, and in the shallow trench dug so laboriously the night before, Chief Shute and his companion crouched. Shots whistled to the right and left of them, and all over them. For five minutes the steady bombardment continued, and when every last one of Chief Shute's decoys had been shot down the shooters stopped.

Cautiously Chief Shute stuck his head over the top of the pit. "What's the big idea?" he asked. "What the——" But he got no further. The city sports cranked up the Ford and left the Chief all alone to pick up the shot riddled decoys and get back to the blinds. "Now I know what the boys went through. This sitting in a trench when you're getting shot at is the bunk," he said.
