LIFE HISTORY OGDEN ARMOUR

Directed One of America's Largest Business Enterprises

CHICAGO, Aug. 17.—Jonathan Ogden Armour, who died in London yesterday, was the eldest son of Philip D. Armour Sr., founder of the great Armour & Co. packing industry. He sacrificed his senior year in Yale University because of his father's desire to give him an early training in the rudiments of the huge business enterprise that he was destined eventually to direct.

After a year of apprenticeship, during which he made a study of every branch of the vast concern, young Armour assumed the executive responsibilities of the packing house, and for more than 17 years applied himself diligently to the task of mastering every phase of the packing business. He assumed complete control upon the death of his father in 1901.

Under the direction of J. Ogden Armour, the volume of Armour & Company's business grew from $182,000,000 a year, to more than $1,000,000,000 a year, and the activities of the company were greatly expanded and developed. Mr. Armour built additional plants in various parts of the country to encourage and develop the production of livestock in the territory surrounding these plants, and to eliminate unduly long hauls to the yards. It was under his guidance also that the South American subsidiaries of the company were established.

These opened world markets to the livestock raisers of South America and broke the valuable monopoly held by British interests in the cattle business of Argentina. Today there are five Armour plants south of the Equator, 15 in the United States, and one in Canada. There also are approximately 400 branch houses in the United States to facilitate distribution. Mr. Armour's administration of the business, according to his closest associates, was peculiar in that it was one of development almost exclusively.

BORN IN MILWAUKEE

J. Ogden Armour was born in Milwaukee, November 11, 1863. Twelve years later the Armour family moved from Milwaukee to Chicago. After attending the public schools there, Mr. Armour entered Yale in 1881, and three years later returned to Chicago to embark upon his business career.

Mr. Armour married Miss Lotta Sheldon, daughter of Martin J. Sheldon of Suffield, Conn., in 1891. She was one daughter, Mrs. John J. Mitchell, Jr., who was Lotta Ogden Armour, born in 1896.

Mr. Armour had extensive business activities in addition to his connection with Armour & Company. He was a director of several large railroads and financial institutions, among them the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, the National City Bank of New York, the Continental and Commercial Bank of Chicago, the Hibernian Banking Association of Chicago and the Northwestern and National Insurance Company of Milwaukee. He also established Armour & Company, Ltd., of London.

Business took most of his time and he devoted little attention to society although grand opera was his one diversion. He was never too busy, however, for a half minute chat with an old employee or an old friend. When meeting one of these he invariably solicited an opinion on the market first and then demanded to know if everything was going all right. The conversation generally ended with Mr. Armour saying, "whenever I can do anything for you let me know."

Old employees were his hobby. Once an "old timer," who was discharged by a department head took his grievance to Mr. Armour.

When the department head explained that the man discharged was incompetent, Mr. Armour replied: "If it took you 15 years to find that out take him back and keep him as long as he lives."

LOVED BY EMPLOYEES

Another time the heads of his accounting departments complained that an old packing house foreman refused to keep books and threw out the bookkeepers they sent him. They were afraid to discharge the veteran and asked Mr. Armour to do it. "No," he replied. "That foreman taught me all I know about that branch of the business but not all he knows. If you can't get those figures some other way you will have to get along without them."

These characteristics made him generally loved by his employees, who regarded him as the supreme court for minor differences.

In 1911, Mr. Armour and nine other Chicago packers were tried in the federal courts at Chicago for alleged violation of the Sherman anti-trust act. The defense offered no testimony in answer to the government's case and the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. Armour perpetuated the charitable and educational work founded by his father. He made large donations to hospitals and relief work of every kind, but never allowed his name to become public in these transactions.

A PHILANTHROPIST

Armour Institute of Technology benefited by his generosity. When the school needed room he purchased an 80-acre golf links in the South Shore district at a reported price of $1,000,000 and announced his intention of building a new home for the school on it.

His methods were quieter than his father's as his personality was less gruff and rugged. Many of his important deals were so quietly executed that few knew he had guided them until they were completed.

He was one of the largest operators on the Chicago Board of Trade, and in one sensational conflict with James A. Patten over control of the wheat market he was said to have won more than $1,000,000 in a few weeks.

He lived in summer on his model farm at Lake Forest. After the world war he left the management of the packing company largely to his nephews, Philip D. Armour III, and Lester Armour, that he might have more time for his other commercial interests.
