Struch Mud Shark and Pinned It to Stem of Steamer Prince George as Bound Northward Seymour Narrows

Trun down a huge mudshark, kill the animal and carry it along on the stem for about six hours was the rather unique experience of the C.N.R. steamer Prince George, Capt. Harry Nedden, this trip north. It was just south of Seymour Narrows, early yesterday morning as the skipper was on the bridge, that the huge marine creature came to the surface in front of the ship and started to dive down but not before it was struck with an impact which pinned it fast to the stem. The creature was tail in the air and nose into the water and was apparently killed instantly. It was estimated to be about twelve feet long, weighing more than a ton. The shark remained fast in front of the ship until the rough waters of Queen Charlotte Sound were entered about six hours later, in the early afternoon. Then it slipped away and apparently went to the bottom.

The incident was productive of much interest on behalf of the passengers and a number of photographs were taken.
