Strong Public Opinion Only Thing to Prevent Lawless Destruction Says Mayor Bury

EDMONTON, Feb. 6.—Strong public opinion, much stronger public opinion than now exists in Edmonton, was recommended by His Worship Mayor Bury as a remedy against the disfiguration and destruction of city property which each year costs the civic administration hundreds of dollars to replace. The mayor was speaking to the women who attended the annual Local Council of Women at the Hudson's Bay palm room. "If boys and girls were taught at home that the trees on the boulevards, the street signs, and street car waiting rooms, which have been among the objects of wanton destruction, were provided with the money of their own fathers and mothers, through the medium of taxes, and that their money would be used to repair the damage, children could be impressed with the care of these as their own property," said his worship.

Continuing, he stated that there was no use clamoring for city improvements if when obtained they were left to the city administration to take care of. When a state of lawlessness exists in a community it is for lack of strong public opinion against such a state, and damage of city property should be met with stronger disapproval than mere words, if necessary.

In connection with city tree planting, the mayor threw out by way of suggestion the idea of obtaining a greater number of evergreen trees for the city which, by reason of its climatic position, favors these rather than deciduous trees, bare for so many months of the year.

CITIZENS MUST HAVE CONFIDENCE

Speaking of successful civic administration, the mayor said: "It is necessary to have a right attitude on the part of the citizens—an attitude of confidence and active support, coupled with patience and appreciation of the problems which that administration has to meet."

Huge Bird Does Not Eat Missionaries but Prefers Fish and Berries

NEW YORK, Feb. 6.—The ladies of foreign missionary societies in all parts of the United States are busily engaged in praising the efforts of Dr. E. W. Guder, associate in ichthyology at the American Museum of Natural History, in discovering conclusive evidence that the cassowary of the family Struthionidae does not eat missionaries as commonly reputed, but confines his appetite almost solely to fish.

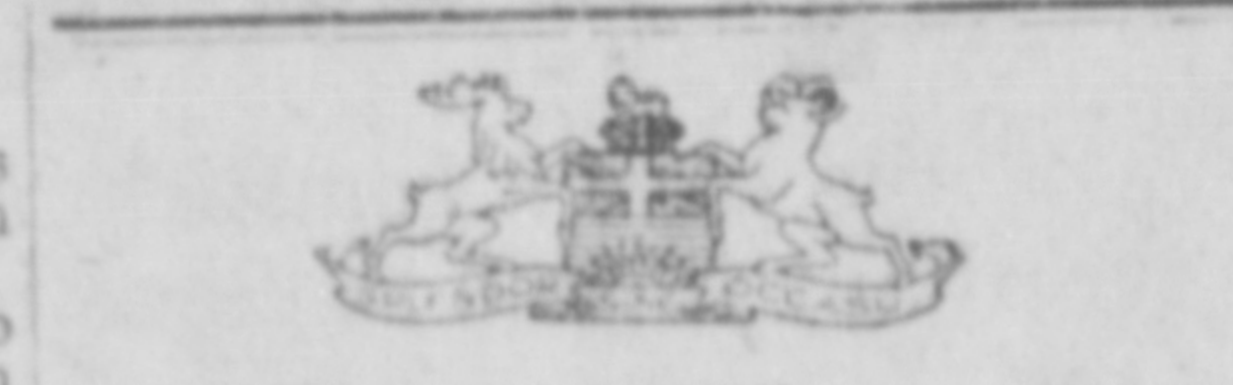

For years and years they had believed, as Dr. Guder aptly expressed it in an article in Natural History, that "Twas a bold cassowary."

On the plains of Timbuctoo

Stiffly ate a missionary

Body, boots and hymn book, too."

There were many reasons why they should have so believed. Fifty years and more ago voracious traders who plied the Solomon Islands and the coast of Australia told terrifying stories of how they had heard of missionaries being eaten by the great birds and how they had on many occasions actually seen the eating performed. Ornithologists had also, in a sense, corroborated the tales of these traders by announcing the discovery that the cassowary, being not unlike an ostrich, disliked water but had a great hankering for flesh. And, putting two and two together, the ladies of the missionary societies decided that the disappearance of their emissaries was due in large part to the omnivorousness of the cassowary. But Dr. Guder's announcement has routed the theory. As a bibliographer he has compiled imposing data during the past several years which shows that, though the cassowary is a bird sometimes more than five feet tall, with legs that can easily outdistance the fleetest of dogs and with wings strong enough to knock down a horse, he prefers a diet of berries and fish to one of blood and bones.

PROPOSED FATE
EXPORT HOUSES

(Toronto Globe)

The most drastic proposal made by the Commission is that all export houses be put out of business, and that this end of the traffic be handled by provincial governments and manufacturers.

"We are convinced," the report states, "that the export houses are established in practically every case for the sole purpose of selling liquor to be smuggled into the United States, and that they exist for no legitimate purpose whatever."

The commission believes that its recommendations on this point would prevent the necessity of revising the treaty with the States. Placing this illegitimate traffic in the hands of the provinces may be one way out. The provinces would hardly dare undertake it. Then it would be left to the brewers and distillers to assume responsibility. This, at least would be narrowing it down to a point where it could be more closely supervised. But would it defeat the run-runner—either the one who brings liquor into the country or the one who takes it out? The export houses should be closed in accordance with the views of the commission. They are responsible for the most obvious canker in the traffic. The run-runner, however, should be dealt with in some other way than by reducing the prices of the goods which he gets by hook or by crook.
