BLACKWOOD on Bridge

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

Experts' Charts Will Help Most on Opening Lead

So much is written about the opening lead that you might gain the impression there isn't much else of importance in the defence of a hand.

Actually, the killing defence on most hands, if it is discovered at all, is discovered AFTER the opening lead.

The opening lead is the favorite subject of bridge writers because it lends itself readily to neat classifications. Compact little charts can be easily prepared, listing the various openings in the order of their desirability. A certain opening can be labelled (with some authority) as a "good" opening, while another is call a "poor" one.

The opening lead is blind in that the opener has not yet seen the cards in dummy. After the first trick, however, he has seen those cards and they may be sharply at variance with the mental picture he had formed, based on the bidding. He may have had it in mind to lead a certain suit the next time he got in. But the looks of the dummy and the entire play to the first few may show that lead to be absolutely hopeless. He then turns his attention to some other possibility which, however remote its apparent chances for success, still offers the only hope. In any case, the latter defence is based on judgment and hard thinking about a specific situation.

In today's deal Mr. Dale opened the king of diamonds. I believe Mr. Muzzy would have chosen the same card. It was routine.

Mr. Champion flashed the nine and Mr. Dale continued with the ace and a third diamond. Winning the third trick with the queen, Mr. Champion paused to think. For his jump bid in spades, Mr. Muzzy must have a six card suit. He had already shown three diamonds, leaving him four cards in the other two suits. Those four could be taken care of by dummy's high cards in hearts and clubs. Therefore, if the defenders could win a fourth trick it would have to be a spade.

The bidding:

2 H	Pass	3 S	Pass
4 S	All pass

Mr. Champion therefore led the 13th diamond at trick four. That was the killer. If Mr. Muzzy ruffed low, Mr. Dale would win with the nine of spades. If he ruffed high, he could not avoid losing a trump trick to Mr. Champion.
