The committee of Industrial Inquiry met recently for the last time, and dissolved itself. It was a very able committee, and it had had the assistance of some extremely able people from outside. The members had been able to come to agreement on many questions in an astonishing way, probably because they were Liberals who accepted the same fundamental things. The committee had worked

It was a report that contained many recommendations, for they had no single slogan like nationalization. They had got to deal with the problems concerned by advancing along many paths. Therefore it would be a considerable task to get the report into the heads of the Liberal party, and then into the best prepared coal. We make heads of the public. This was where University Liberals could greatly assist. TOAST OF PARTY

Ramsay Muir, proposing the toast of the Liberal party, said that at the present time it was good to be a young Liberal because the young Liberal could look forward to seeing the achievement of new Liberal ideals in the new world into which we had drifted. The more they thought about the problems of the new era, the more convinced he was sure they would be that it was only along Liberal lines that solutions would be found. In the new era that began after the war they had come to realize that the old relationships of master and servant which had hitherto sufficed for the organization of industry and productive relationships would suffice no longer, and that new and Liberal ideas had got to be worked out and applied. At the present time the Liberal party seemed weak and disorganized. The reason, he thought, was this. Liberal ideals were so immense and so difficult to grasp that they could not be put into one program sufficient for all time. Liberals, therefore, had in each generation to work out a program comprising the next steps forward. When the war came the Liberal program for the time being seemed to be almost worked out. Consequently Liberals had now to work out a new program for the new gener-

C. P. Scott, who supported the toast, said he believed that the spirit of Liberalism was indestructible, and that therefore Liberalism was indestructible. He believed it was true, as Ramsay Muir had said, that the Liberal party was doing the great constructive thinking and the really formative work of politics today. People spoke sometimes of the Liberal party as if it were decadent and almost moribund. The wish was probably father to the thought. No one could be present at such a gathering as that without realising that Liberalism was alive to the fullest isense in the minds and hearts of young

It had been said by one speaker that the Liberal party should stand alone. In a sense that was good advice. Liberals had to develop their own program and their own ideals apart from any other party. Moreover, the Liberal party was able to stand by itself and seek the national interest as no other party could. At the same time they had got to comtemplate the possibility of not succeding in their hone of placing the Liberal party in power, with an independent majority, at the next general election. The question then arose: supposing there was a progressive ma- Lal jority of Liberals and Labor men, what were they to do? He thought that would be an occasion for considering a policy of co-operation. He was convinced that there was nothing really

The players themselves have been doing the best that the city has known in the way of basketball. The sporting public should be giving them correspondingly increased support. As a break in the regular league doings will come the series with Kincolth next week which should prove quite interesting.
