PEACE RIVER OUTLET CAM-PAIGN IS OPENED WITH MON-STER BANQUET AT WHICH ALL CITY LEADERS PRESENT.

S. D. Macdonald spoke of the former attitude of Labor and capital toward each other. This was all changed. He paid a compliment to the committee that had gone to the Peace River and said he thought they had done better work than any previous delegations that had gone from Prince Rupert. They had preached the

Mr. Macdonald said the city was what the people liked to make it. Georgraphically and otherwise they had right on their side in this campaign. The committee should get undivided support. This was one of the best movements yet inaugurated and it was up to the people to get behind it.

P. H. Linzey said the aim of the gathering was to arouse interest and general enthusiasm. He trusted that the smoldering embers would be fanned to a flaming fire. The key word was "enthusiasm." It was the greatest asset in life. The enthusiast was able to convince and dominate. Prejudice was trampled under foot and opposition was inundated and swamped. If Prince Rupert had faith in the justice of their demands they should put that faith into action. He had met knockers of whom there were too many in the city. If there was one of them there that night h esuggested he be thrown out. If they failed it would be because of lack of enthusiasm.

Mr. Linzey spoke of the visits of Sir Henry Thornton and of his saying the Canadian National here was their baby. They were sick and tired of this and it was time they got through cutting their teeth. They wanted no more Thornton soothing powders but they wanted the Peace outlet. "If we let Vancouver rob us of our

George Bushby said he knew the people of Vancouver were very keen for this and if they set out for anything they were a hard of to beat. He knew because he had worked with them. Mayer Malkin had given the keynote. He suggested that efforts should be made to educate the people of Vancouver for they were not all unfair. He urged that the justice of Prince Rupert's cause be placed before them. Publicity was a great thing. Corporations were cowards when it came to "vox populi."

Backs to the Wall M. P. McCaffery spoke optimisof the work and influence Power Corporation. He said stances where they should unite as was the case today. They had expected great things from the elevator but had been disappointed. hope with their backs to the wall. If the Peace River connection did not come, Prince Rupert would remain a fishing village. He had been in the city 21 years and he felt this was his last hope. There was no logic in building the railway to Vancouver as only the Vancouver people wanted it and the newspapers of Vancouver. He was ready to go all the way in support of the movement.

J. C. Brady congratulated the chairman on the wonderful response to their call. He did not recall such a representation in Prince Rupert before. Common endeavor could do so much more than individual effort.

Mr. Brady then outlined the steps leading up to the present situation in the Peace River, which led to the Canadian National and the C.P.R. taking the road over jointly. There had been a number of preliminary surveys made and two extensions of branch lines were to be made next year. This he considered a farce. The Canadian National was being made the pawn in the game. The wealth of the Peace River was enormous.

Mr. Brady then went over the grounds on which Prince Rupert claimed the right to have the railway outlet. Strategically and geographically their claims were superior to those of Vancouver. It was a case where they should speak as one voice. It was a grave danger to the country when the great centres obtained control. The 38 per cent of the population in the northern country should unite to secure what they demanded.

The voice of Prince Rupert reached farther than was thought. They had something to fight for and the whole north, including the Peace River itself, would join them in the fight. The people of the Peace demanded an outlet and it was to decide if they were to have the most economic outlet or not. He urged all to join the association

Philip Ray suggested that the committee should use the mails in their advertising campaign. This it was explained had already been under advisement and would be carried out.
