that traps would put fishermen out of employment and be disastrous to local industry. A large portion of the population of Northern B. C. would be endangered.

Lack of Evidence

Mr. Lord contended that Mr. Payne had submitted no proof of his contention that salmon passing through Pierce Canal all went to Alaska waters. On the other hand, it had been shown that these fish had passed on to the Naas River and elsewhere in Canadian waters.

The U.S. bureau of fisheries was not satisfied with the maintainance of the salmon fishery in southern Alaska and in 1929 proposed closing many more areas to trap fishing. There were other curtailments as well.

Local Rivers

The pack of red salmon on both the Naas and Skeena Rivers had declined during the years that the American traps were operated. This would be accentuated, Mr. Lord contended, by the traps that were now asked for. He felt that when steps were being taken in southeastern Alaska to curtail fishing there was no time to allow more intensive fishing on this side of the line.
