BRITONS PREPARE FOR LONG ENDURANCE FLIGHT

PATTULLO AT THE BANQUET IN HIS HONOR

Surveys Whole Realm of Provincial Politics From Liberal Point of View

Pledges made by Dr. S. F. Tolmie, leader of the Conservative government, before the election last July were all gone by the board; the government during the last session proved itself ill-prepared and ill-informed upon the program it presented, and it had proved itself a flagrant upholder of the political patronage principle it so bitterly condemned while in opposition, declared T. D. Pattullo, leader of the Liberal opposition, in an address at the big banquet in his honor at Vancouver. Liberals from Vancouver and the Lower Mainland, the Fraser Valley, Victoria and as far north as Prince Rupert, numbering some 500, gathered to greet their leader. Referring to the defeat of his party last July, Mr. Pattullo said notwithstanding the general and increasing prosperity in the industrial life of the province and the advance of its social welfare, its people, as is the case everywhere, are prone to believe they are not receiving their just deserts and are ready to listen to golden promises. Thus, he said, a new government, with promises of better things, was put in power.

Old Policy Adopted

That government, he charged, had, in many cases, followed the policy of its predecessors, which it so severely criticized while in opposition. Only last week, he said, an order-in-council was passed authorizing the minister of lands to allow the export of raw logs upon such conditions as he might see fit. Yet, upon that very issue, the Liberal administration was accused of being in collusion with United States interests to the detriment of British Columbia.

Thus, said the speaker, the situation was created whereby what his party did was treason, but the present government could follow the same policy and call it patriotic endeavor. He told of being refused the right to view orders-in-council before he was elected leader of his party and of being told the duly-constituted leader of the opposition was the only person, outside members of the government, who could view them.

Claim Advanced

Mr. Pattullo said orders-in-council were nothing more or less than written decisions of the government and were not the property of the government but of the people of the province. His party, he said, never withheld them from the public.

"If they want to hide private sale of bonds until the deed is done, one can understand their decision to avoid publication of their orders-in-council," said the speaker.

In dealing with the civil service Mr. Pattullo charged the government had broken faith with the service and with the public. Its morale was being destroyed, he claimed, and favoritism was rampant.

Old and tried civil servants were being dismissed and violent partisans, frequently incompetent, were being enrolled in their places, he said.

Referring to paternal legislation, he said the government, through the minister of finance, had said it would go no further along lines of legislation looking to the social and domestic welfare of the people, as it had already gone too far.

Presenting the other side of the picture, Mr. Pattullo said the Liberal administration had encouraged capital to come into the province but, at the same time, it believed the state should help those who could not help themselves and had legislated along those lines.

When the telephone bill, granting a charter to the telephone company, enabling it to establish radio-telephony throughout the province and thus serve many isolated communities were submitted, the opposition, said the speaker, recognized it as a good thing but, by an amendment endeavored to protect the people of British Columbia against excessive charges but the government by the application of the party lash, voted it down, seemingly not interested in the question of rates but only in giving the telephone company a blanket charter.

Action Criticized

In the dying hours of the session the government brought down what the speaker termed the most important legislation it had offered. This was the public utility legislation. Once more the opposition sought to amend the proposal that the tariff of charges following high precedent should be based upon the money honestly and prudently invested, and not in addition thereto upon money ploughed in from profits paid by the consuming public. Once more, he said, the "thumping" majority voted down the amendment which was designed only to protect the users of the service.

The next amendment made by the opposition that fared in like fashion was that to the water power legislation of the government. This the government treated as a want of confidence motion, said the speaker, and as a result water power, a vast amount of which is still inalienated, can be alienated without the consent of the legislature and placed in the hands of party henchmen.

Succession Act Hit

Abolition of succession duties on life insurance was another act of the government severely criticized by Mr. Pattullo.

The sale of bonds privately, Mr. Pattullo said, was looked upon with suspicion by the public, but such a sale was one of the first acts of the government and provision was made in the agreement for the payment of a 1 per cent commission for advice tendered by the syndicate who disposed of them. As some $12,000,000 of bonds were sold under the system the loss to the province through the payment of the commission was over the life of the bond issue, a heavy one.

had to be absolutely divorced from politics. That policy was followed by the Liberal party when it was in power, he said, when it had to appoint a man to that position.

A new comptroller-general has been appointed, he said, and while he was not disparaging him in any way or calling into question his ability, it was known he had been intimately associated with the minister of finance in a private enterprise.

Mr. Pattullo closed his address with an attack on constitutional changes made by the government with reference to elimination of by-elections for its ministers. He prophesied a ministerial rearrangement would take place shortly and suggested the government would find it advisable not to hold a by-election when it made such changes.
