BUILDING ROADS

ject is directed from the Vancouver fisheries office.
Since November, when the project was started, 26 miles of gravel road has been graded along the banks of the Skeena's north arm. And this has been the easiest part of the job, with a few interruptions by musky flats, creeks which need bridging and by several feet of snow.

The men work with two bulldozers, live in sled-drawn moveable camps and have a jeep and truck with which to get their supplies, most of which are purchased locally at Hazelton.

Dyson began with nine men but now has seven. The toughest job he expects to find follows another 20 miles where the river narrows into a canyon-faced gorge and he can no longer follow the banks. Surveying just ahead of the construction gang, the young engineer hopes to cut through a pass which will bring him near the site of the blockade. The whole area is mountainous, capped by towering alacial peaks.

The first few miles were comparatively easy. Dyson reports, because the party followed the Silver Standard mines road. This has since run out and the gang is on its own, swathing through the timbered area and using plenty of corduroy and gravel.

A short rest is in store for the road gang during the Christmas season, but it is doubtful whether all men will get out. Dyson expects to complete the road in January.

While the eyes of the fishing industry are intent on this and future developments to safeguard the most important salman specie, this new road is viewed by others also as a toehold in further development of the North. It is the first time such a road has penetrated north of the Skeena River into a country rich in fur, game, fish and animals, scenic grandeur—and possibly minerals.
