Both are travelling by air staff officer.

The headquarters officers, who have been visiting HMCS Discovery at Vancouver and at HMCS Chatham yesterday and today, feel that "a completely new and wonderful" design of uniforms for the women in the navy will offer a great attraction.

For instance, the walking-out summer dress is two-tone, with a "skipper" blue skirt and an all-white jacket with all-gilt shingleless buttons. Shoes will be navy blue, "pomps" and "there'll be no more cotton stockings," laughed Lt. Beck. All clothes will be "tailored to fit," she added.

Perhaps the greatest attraction is the pay and rank, which will be on the same basis as now ruled for men. After six months basic training, reservists will be able to take a special course.

"Of course, we have one trade open now and can take any number from Prince Rupert for continuous service in the Communications trade. Experienced radio operators would get a permanent position almost immediately."

The two women officers comprise half of the small staff at Ottawa now organizing the new Wrens. And they're most enthusiastic about it.

"This trip has been a great deal of pleasure as well," said Lt. Beck, for this is her first trip to the west coast. From Toronto, she agrees she has never seen "scenery or weather as nice as you have here."

Lt. Allen, whose home is at Sechart, had a full day and a supper at home, and "that was a good pay-off for me," she twinkled.

Ranks of Navy, Under New Set-up, Open to Women Here

First Prince Rupert women to be accepted in Canadian naval service of WRCN(R) will likely be able to wear their brand new uniforms before the end of October.

Leutenants Myrtle I. Allen and Margaret E. Beck, from WRCN organization staff headquarters at Ottawa, said today in Prince Rupert that recruiting for women in Navy Reserve will begin September 17, and 15 recruits are wanted immediately.

Canadian quota is 500. The Canadian Navy is the last of the three services to accept women recruits during peacetime. While the RCAF is accepting women as permanent force members, both Navy and Army, said Lt. Allen, have only received permission to recruit reserves.

"This will mean that we can use 15 women between ages 19 and 25 here in Prince Rupert to attend basic training classes at HMCS Chatham once a week."

Several applicants for divisional officer here have been interviewed, the WRCN officers said, and final selection will be made within a few days.

"And people of Prince Rupert will get a chance to see a good deal of this group of women," promised Lt. Noel Langham, staff officer.
