Blackwood on Bridge

By Easley Blackwood

One rubber with Mr. New, using the point count method, was enough for Mr. Abel. He wondered how he ever got talked into challenging Mr. Masters and Mr. Champion. He quit.

But his place was promptly taken by Mr. Muzzy who, like Mr. New, believes the count method of bidding will enable him to beat the experts.

Mr. Masters quit, too. He said his conscience was beginning to bother him. Mr. Dale replaced him.

Mr. Champion didn't quit. He has no conscience.

"Let me in there," said Mr. Muzzy broadly. "You guys just don't know how to handle this system."

He sat down in the North seat and promptly laid his trusty abacus on the table.

Mr. Champion did a quick double-take. "What in the --- is that thing?" he demanded.

Mr. New explained it was a device to help Mr. Muzzy count up his points. Shifting the beads along the wires made adding and subtracting easier for Mr. Muzzy. He hoped. And besides, its use was not forbidden by the rules.

"Well, at least you can get the thing off the table," Mr. Champion growled. "Otherwise your partner can see what your exact count is."

This seemed fair, so Mr. Muzzy hid the abacus in his lap. He dealt, looked at his cards, frowned, then laid the cards on the table. He leaned over, dropped both hands to his lap and started fingering his abacus.

Mr. Dale smiled resignedly. Mr. Champion looked bored. "I've got an old jig-saw puzzle with only a few pieces missing," he said. "Think I'll bring it down tomorrow and work on it while I play bridge."

Finally Mr. Muzzy reached a decision. "One no trump," he said proudly. In spite of the slight weakness in the spade suit, the boys rolled merrily into three no trump. Mr. Dale doubled and calmly took the first seven tricks.

"Why," asked Mr. Muzzy, "did you raise without a spade stopper?"

"The book says," replied Mr. New, bookishly, "that with a count of nine the fact that I have no spade stopper shouldn't deter me from making my natural raise. Why did YOU bid no trump without a spade stopper?"

"Because," announced Mr. Muzzy triumphantly, "the book says you need three suits protected to bid one no trump. And that's what I had."

I don't know who won the argument.

But Mr. Dale, who kept out of it, won the points.
